About 10,000 to 15,000 people showed their solidarity with Israel at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Walk With Israel on Sunday. The walk, which kicked off with a speech by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, raised some $350,000 for UJA initiatives in Bat Yam, Israel.

Thousands walk with Israel

The people of Israel will not compromise their own security for peace, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Sunday at the Walk With Israel, sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"We must ensure that we achieve a peace that's anchored in security. The only peace that can endure is a peace we can defend," Netanyahu told an audience of some 7,000 at Ricoh Coliseum in downtown Toronto.

Netanyahu, who spoke in Toronto before meeting with Prime Minister Stephen Harper in Ottawa on Monday, stressed that any future Palestinian state must be a demilitarized one.

"And I don't just mean a paper agreement. We had one in Lebanon, it didn't work. We had one in Gaza, it didn't work," he said. "Palestine will have to recognize Israel as the nation state for the Jewish People."

Netanyahu warned about repeating mistakes made in Lebanon and Gaza..

"When Israel left Lebanon, Iran moved in. When Israel left Gaza, Iran moved in," he said, adding that Israel and its allies must be wary of a regime that supports Holocaust deniers.

The News in Brief

Canada

Anti-Semitism Ruling

OTTAWA — The federal government discriminated against a Jewish civil servant because she followed her religion, a federal adjudicator ruled. The ruling agreed that Valery LaBranche's workplace at the Ottawa headquarters of Passport Canada was poisoned by anti-Semitism, the Ottawa Citizen reported. The ruling said LaBranche's co-workers discriminated against her because she left work early on Fridays to observe Shabbat and took off Jewish holidays, and that "her bosses did little or nothing to help her." LaBranche, who converted to Judaism in 1997, said she was traumatized and required medical treatment and time off. She launched her grievance in 2007. The ruling said she became ill and unable to work after anonymous anti-Semitic messages were sent to her superiors. The ruling criticized Passport Canada as being more interested in protecting itself than her well-being.

Diamond Inducted

VANCOUVER — The late Jack Diamond was inducted into the B.C. Hall of Fame as a business leader who made an outstanding contribution to his community. Diamond, who died in 2001 at 91, was one of four 2010 inductees. He arrived in Vancouver from Poland at age 17 and parlayed a small butcher shop into the Pacific Meat Company, the largest packing house in B.C. A key philanthropist in the Jewish community, he co-founded Schara Tzedeck Synagogue, and was a companion of the Order of Canada and a member of the Order of British Columbia.

World

Diplomat Expelled

SYDNEY, Australia — Australia ordered the expulsion of an Israeli diplomat after a probe concluded there was "no doubt" Israel forged four Australian passports used in the assassination of a senior Hamas leader. Foreign Minister Stephen Smith said May 24 that he'd asked an unnamed diplomat to leave within one week. The reaction follows Britain's action in March to expel an Israeli security agent after an investigation that it said gave compelling evidence Israel was behind the Jan. 20 killing of Mahmoud al-Mabhouh in a Dubai hotel. Thirty-three members of an assassination team speculated to have been Mossad agents used forged passports from Britain, Ireland, Australia and Germany to enter and leave Dubai. Israel has neither confirmed nor denied Mossad involvement.

Nuke Claim Denied

LONDON — Secret apartheid-era documents show Israel offered to sell nuclear weapons to South Africa in the 1970s, Britain's Guardian newspaper reported May 24, but Israel denied the claims. The papers give the first documentary evidence that Israel has nuclear weapons, the Guardian reported. The documents were found by U.S. scholar Sasha Polakow-Suransky while researching his new book The Unspoken Alliance: Israel's Secret Relationship with Apartheid South Africa. South Africa reportedly didn't buy the weapons, partly because of cost, and eventually built its own bombs, possibly with Israeli help.

Cotler Named To JPost's Jewish Top 50

JERUSALEM — The Jerusalem Post named Liberal MP and lawyer Irwin Cotler as the only Canadian on its first annual list of the world's 50 most influential Jews.

The former justice minister and McGill University law professor is a "staunch defender of Israel from a human rights vantage point, and a very frequent visitor here, he is widely credited with having influenced Canada's current supportive stance on the Jewish state," the Post said.

Topping the list is Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, while Ben Bernanke, chairman of the U.S. Federal Reserve, is second, and White House Chief of Staff Rahm Emanuel is third. Others on the Israeli- and American-dominated list include Israeli President Shimon Peres (No. 7), Google founder Sergey Brin (4), Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz (9), musician Bob Dylan (46), philanthropist Sheldon Adelson (19), U.K. Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks (32), filmmaker Steven Spielberg (31), and Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg (23).

The Post said that it made its choices "based on a range of criteria, including personal access to power, ability to exert influence and individual talent," and on the "ability to fashion the face of the future."

Also last week, Cotler, 70, received an honorary degree, his 10th, from the Interdisciplinary Center Herzliya for his work on human rights around the world.

Pride nixes term 'Israeli Apartheid,' bans QuAIA

'Pride Toronto does not take a position on the conflict in the Middle East'

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Pride Toronto's board of directors has decided to ban the use of the term "Israeli apartheid" at this year's parade and at all its events.

The ban – adopted by a 4-3 vote of Pride's board on May 21 – effectively prevents the group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) from participating in the event, at least under its current name, something it had done for the last few years.

In a statement last week, Pride said it made the decision reluctantly, after being "subjected to extensive lobbying on this debate" and after receiving "complaints of allowing discriminatory and exclusionary messaging."

It had also been warned by the City of Toronto that allowing the term was in violation of Toronto's anti-discrimination policies.

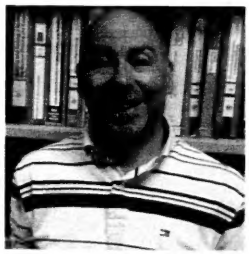
Pride Toronto noted that the expression "Israeli Apartheid" had appeared in the parade as early as 2007 and the organization has since "issued several statements in support of freedom of speech for all participants."

The organization said all the controversy surrounding the potential presence of QuAIA at this year's event had created an "operational crisis" for the festival.

"It's important to understand that Pride Toronto does not take a position on the conflict in the Middle East," said Margaret Ngai, Pride's interim co-chair. "We are obliged to respect and follow City policies in addition to legislations of all levels of government when considering freedom of expression."

Immediately after the decision was announced, QuAIA said it would defy the ban and submit its application to the "leaders of the LGBT community" instead.

Though QuAIA may not be able to use its banner at the parade, group members can still march together as individuals.



Martin Gladstone

Because of Pride's decision, a motion brought forward by city councillor Giorgio Mammoliti last month to deprive the parade of city funds if it allowed the group to march was rendered moot. But Mammoliti said he has no plans to revoke the motion, because he wants to "wait and see" whether QuAIA or some form of the group will still be allowed to march, in which case he would continue to call for city funding to be withdrawn from the parade.

"We have to keep this threat hanging over [Pride's] head," Mammoliti said.

His motion is still scheduled to be debated by council's executive committee on June 14. Mammoliti said he would seek to amend it to try to retroactively recoup city funding from Pride if QuAIA is allowed to march in any form or under another name.

Martin Gladstone, the Toronto lawyer and activist who has pressured Pride organizers and sponsors this year by screening and distributing his documentary film Reclaiming Our Pride – which depicts QuAIA as anti-Semitic and hateful – said he's happy with Pride's decision.

Strong, vigorous relations

The visit on the weekend to Toronto by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was the first visit to the city since that of prime minister Menachem Begin 32 years earlier. His visit to Ottawa was the first to the capital since that of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, 17 years earlier.

Last week, merely days before Netanyahu's departure for Canada, he met with Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty in Jerusalem. (See the related news story elsewhere in this edition.)

From the editor's desk...

There is clearly a strong, vigorous connection between the two countries. In acknowledgment of that connection and to capitalize upon the buzz and excitement surrounding the visit by Netanyahu, the government of Israel arranged a background briefing on the weekend with travelling Israeli officials for Toronto-based media. The CJN was invited to take part.

The aim of the briefing was to expand upon the underlying purposes and objectives of the Israeli prime minister's visit to Canada.

"We trust the Canadians," a highly placed Israeli visitor told the group. "Indeed, in the Middle East generally, there is a positive attitude toward Canada." (Of course, the government of Iran might not share that view, but then the government of Iran likely holds a positive attitude toward very few countries in the satanic West.)

Israel shares a "large bilateral agenda" with Canada, the official said. He then elaborated upon three specific items on the agenda that would occupy the majority of the discussions between the two prime ministers in Ottawa.

The first item relates to the stalled, sputtering peace process between Israelis and Palestinians.

Canada is already the gavel-holder on one of six UN-sanctioned Mideast-peace-process working committees, dating back to the Madrid Conference in 1991. The committees deal with the subject of finding a resolution of the issue of Palestinian refugees.

Due to the wide trustworthiness enjoyed by Canada in the region, the visiting official suggested that Canada ought also consider picking up the gavel of the committee charged with finding solutions to the myriad water-related issues arising in the peace process.

The second item on that "large bilateral agenda" concerns joint economic projects, especially in the realm of high tech and innovation in which Israel is acknowledged as a world leader.

"Canada is perched between two huge markets – the U.S. and Asia," we were reminded. Israel and Canada have a common interest, therefore, in joining forces to try to penetrate those two huge markets even further. The official clearly implied that Israel has the capability to add value to the high-quality Canadian products and services in every conceivable industrial field already finding their way into Asian and American markets.

"The future belongs to countries that deal in conceptual products and conceptual services," the official emphasized and re-emphasized. Canada and Israel, the suggestion was made, can succeed together in the tremendously competitive, international, globalized world.

The third item on the agenda is Iran. In light of the imminent hosting here of the gathering of the G8 countries, it was important that Israel and Canada exchange views on the threat posed to the world by Iran's drive for nuclear weapons.

"The greatest threat to the world," the official suggested, "is the marriage of a radical Islamic regime and nuclear weapons."

Such a regime, it was pointed out, would not have to fire a weapon to be a menace. The threat of the possible use of such weapons implicit in possessing them would ignite a nuclear arms race in the Middle East. And "a nuclear tinderbox in the Middle East," which would result with the outbreak of a nuclear arms race in the area, "is not a very good idea."

The dozen or so editors sat with the visiting officials in an easy and relaxed atmosphere. The discussion was wide ranging. Apart from the key subject of Canada-Israel relations, conversation veered mostly toward issues of security and diplomacy.

One question did arise, however, that touched directly upon the subject of the peoplehood of the worldwide Jewish communities: the intention of the Israeli government on the matter of the conversion bill making its way through the Knesset. The non-Orthodox streams of Judaism in the Disapora, along with the umbrella group of community federations in North America, have called the conversion bill disastrous for the Jewish people. They have all pleaded with the Israeli government to block its passage.

The visiting official answered the question quite categorically. The Israeli government, we were told, seeks a solution that is inclusive and respectful of all streams of Judaism. The leaders of the various denominations need to "talk directly with each other to solve these problems."

Twice, the official emphasized the over-arching aim of the Israeli government in this matter is "to keep the Jewish people whole and united." The response may have been but a curiosity for most of the editors at the briefing But for this editor and for the readers of this paper, it was a gratifying response. May it now come to pass.

A FREE RIDE HOME

A Canadian Israel Defence Forces soldier got a free ride home on Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's plane last week. He met the soldier, Jonatan Feder, while he was watching an IDF manoeuvre in northern Israel. At the end of the training exercise, two soldiers were taken to meet Netanyahu. When he asked where the soldiers were from, he was surprised to hear that Feder hailed from Vancouver. Netanyahu then offered to fly Feder home, arranging the soldier's furlough to coincide with his own trip to Canada at the end of May. Above, Feder, left, shares a moment with Netanyahu and his wife, Sarah on the plane.

'We must defend the truth in every forum'

"We must ensure such a regime does not acquire weapons of mass death," he said.

Netanyahu, who is the first sitting Israeli prime minister to visit Toronto since Menachem Begin 32 years ago, was supposed to meet with U.S. President Barack Obama in Washington, D.C., after visiting Canada, but he cut his trip short and returned to Israel after 10 international activists were killed when Israeli Navy commandos stormed a ship bringing aid to the Gaza Strip.

In Toronto, Netanyahu stressed that Israel faces unique challenges as a Jewish state, including constant attacks on the country's legitimacy.

"They take place on college campuses... in the media. It's important to fight back against these lies. We must defend the truth in every forum," he said.

In his speech, he acknowledged Canada's role in this fight.

"[Harper] has been an unwavering friend of Israel and a great champion of Israel's right to defend itself. We deeply appreciate his support."

Explaining the importance of participating in the Walk With Israel, he said, "Year after year, you march for Israel. Year after year you march for truth... and by doing that, you show us we're not alone."

Netanyahu's presence was met with applause, but also with protests, before and during the walk. But several Canadian politicians made their support clear.

Peter Kent, minister of state of foreign affairs for the Americas, who spoke along with Netanyahu at the opening ceremonies, said those who threaten Israel threaten Canada.

"Last week, the Economist magazine published an article called Canada and Israel: Unlikely Allies... The title couldn't be more wrong," Kent told the crowd. "Canada and Israel are the most natural of allies. At home or abroad, our government has stood proudly [with Israel.] Israel can always count on our unequivocal support."

Speaking before the event, Kent said it's been too long since an Israeli prime minister visited Canada.

"It's a good chance to speak to the community and meet with our government, [and] to give our government a chance to talk about common threats," he said. "The relationship [between Canada and Israel] goes back 62 years. Canada has, from the creation of the state of Israel, embraced [it]."

Kent added that the visit will give Canadians a chance to see Israel as more than just a state at war.

"Too often, we think of Israel in terms of war, but there's so much to celebrate in the arts... in the academics, the list goes on and on," he said.

Howard English, federation's vice-president of corporate communications, said Netanyahu's visit is a testament to the strength of Toronto's Jewish community, adding that federation expected a larger turnout than the usual 10,000 participants.

"It's a thrill that Netanyahu decided to launch the walk," he said. "An event like this says this is a community that's unbreakably tied to Israel. There's a strong sense of commitment to Israel... despite criticism of what Israel may be doing."

An estimated 10,000 to 15,000 people marched on the walk, which raised about $350,000 for UJA initiatives in disadvantaged areas of Bat Yam, a suburb of Tel Aviv.

Daphna Grossman, who participated in the walk, sees the event as a chance for Torontonians to show solidarity for the Jewish state.

"The reason Jews are safe is because of Israel. We have to show solidarity. It's important for Jews to know their history," she said.

For Alicia Desmarteau, who marched with International Christian Embassy Jerusalem, a group that supports Israel, it's just as important for Christians to know their history.

"I think that, as Christians, we need to recognize that the roots of our faith come from the Jewish faith. So we have to acknowledge... that we have the same values," she said, adding that it was exciting to hear Netanyahu speak.

"I so admire his leadership," she said.

Sarah Kula, a 16-year-old volunteer, learned the importance of Zionism at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, where she's a student. "I feel a deep connection to Israel... [The walk] means something," she said.

A present and future bond

Amid the excitement generated last weekend in Toronto and on Monday in Ottawa by the remarkable public display of appreciation and support for Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu by both "ordinary" and government folk alike, we must not forget the extraordinary achievement last week of the unique 40-person delegation to Israel led by Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty. The premier led a trade mission to Israel, the West Bank and Lebanon with some of Ontario's leading-edge life scientists and life science enterprises. The purpose of the five-day mission, according to the Ontario government, was "to promote Ontario's innovative life sciences companies, attract investment and strengthen cultural ties."

McGuinty met with Netanyahu, President Shimon Peres, scientists, researchers and businessmen at the heart of Israel's muscular high-tech industry. His agenda was a visionary one: to explore as many joint life science ventures with Israel as possible. For example, he discussed innovation and clean water technology with Peres and subjects of renewable energy and the potential for collaboration on brain research with Netanyahu.

"Israel has more scientists and engineers per capita than almost anywhere else in the world, and they're one of the few countries to maintain growth during the global recession," the premier said.

"We're here in Israel to show how we can improve lives with new partnerships in the life sciences. We have a lot to learn from Israeli scientists and entrepreneurs who have embraced the challenge of sustaining life in the challenging desert climate. Ontario's own high-skilled workers and researchers are eager to explore partnerships with those who brought electricity and water to the desert," he added.

As reported by Jenny Hazan, the mission was the result of 3-1/2 years of co-operation in the field of the life sciences. A long list of prominent Canadian decision-makers has visited Israel since 2006, including 12 federal ministers, two provincial delegations and 10 university presidents. In 2005, Ontario's Ministry of Research and Innovation signed a memorandum of understanding with Israel's Ministry of Industry and Labour to collaborate on scientific and technological research. That memorandum was but the precursor to the various memoranda of understanding and investment agreements signed last week.

"In Israel and in Ontario, we both understand that investing in scientific research is not enough," McGuinty said. "We also have to support the evolution of that new knowledge [for curing disease] into new products, new services, new jobs and new economic growth."

To the ties of shared democratic values, Canada and Israel are now increasingly adding economic interests. In the process, they may advance science and knowledge to far-reaching horizons.

Together they form a present and a future bond that we hope will last forever for the betterment of all humanity.

Israel was scheduled to complete its long-awaited pullout from Lebanon on June 6, 1985, the three-year anniversary of the start of the First Lebanon War, Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres told French radio. He added, however, that Israel would keep some troops in Lebanon for several weeks to help the Israeli-backed South Lebanon Army create a security zone along the border.

Israeli democracy exists against all odds

Contrary to Naomi Chazan's claim, Israeli democracy is more vibrant than ever ("Criticism key to democracy, New Israel Fund president says). Through its proportional representation system and with the lowest threshold (1.5 per cent) in the world, Israel's democratic system allows a strong voice for minority groups. In contrast, Canada does not provide any representation to large segments of the population.

Separating men and women in a small number of buses in some parts of Israel is the act of a minority group that the large majority of Israelis condemn. It's interesting that Chazan, who believes in protecting the rights of minorities, uses this as an opportunity to criticize Israeli society.

Israeli Arabs do not enjoy the same prosperity as Jews, only partly due to prejudice. However, one cannot ignore the context. Many Israelis believe that they are under existential threat. Statements by some Israeli Arab leaders do not help to alleviate their concerns. Civil rights suspension during distress times are frequent in mature democracies. Canada suspended the civil rights of Canadian citizens of Japanese origin during World War II, and in 1970, Canada suspended the civil rights of Quebecers as a response to terrorism. Sept. 11 also resulted in civil rights violations in many democracies. Nobody is claiming the end of democracy in those countries. Israel is under greater threat than any democracy, and despite that, it allows Israeli Arabs to express their wish for the destruction of Israel as a Jewish state, without consequences.

Not unlike Canadians' feelings toward the Bloc Québécois, Israelis defend the rights of Israeli Arabs to work against the legitimacy of their country, but understandably resent it. Notwithstanding, a recent study in Israel suggests that 87 per cent of secular Jews, 82 per cent of Arab Israelis and 96 per cent of haredi Jews (the latter two are anti-Zionist minorities) are happy with their lives. These numbers do not indicate minority oppression.

Israel not occupying other people's lands

Prof. Ruth Gavison states that Israel should announce that it is a state bound by international law ("Declare interest in a 'just peace,'" May 21). Many of us are trying to educate Jews as to what international law states, for many Jews, including Gavison, are unaware of what Israel's legal rights are. According to international law, valid to this day, Jews have the legal right to settle anywhere in what was called "western" Palestine," that is, between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea. This right remains in full theoretical force today in what was called "eastern Palestine," now called the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. There are no illegal settlements. Israel is not occupying another people's land.

It's all in the numbers

Rachael Turkienicz's May 6 column on "A celebration of numbers" was of particular interest to those of us with a mathematical bent. Several years ago, when my father passed away between Pesach and Shavuot, I determined that the number 49 (the number of days between the two holidays) had as its factors only the numbers 7 and 7 (since it is a perfect square), the sum of which is 14. Similarly the number 33, representing Lag b'Omer, has as its factors only 3 and 11, the sum of which is also 14. Furthermore, the only other number whose factors add up to 14 is the number 16 (2 + 4 + 8), which equals 49 - 33. Coincidence or religious significance?

For anyone with an interest or mathematical fascination with the number 3 as outlined in Turkienicz's article, I would refer them to a paper I wrote that was published in the Missouri Journal of Mathematical Sciences, Volume 18, No. 1, 2006.

Memory card found

We recently found a memory card from a digital camera in a puddle in Toronto. We brought it home and downloaded the hundreds of pictures to our computer to see if they would give us clues about the owner. Some of the pictures are from a bris, and we are hoping someone will recognize the people in it. We would be happy to send them the memory card if they contact us at charney@CharneyDay.com.

Perspectives

Jewish values are social justice values

The following piece was adapted from a discourse delivered as part of a Shavuot panel discussion on May 18 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre in Toronto.

By PHILIP B. BERGER

I was raised in Winnipeg, where my maternal grandparents moved from Russia nearly 100 years ago. As far as my memory reaches, I can recollect tales of my grandparents' time in the deep zone of deadly Russian pogroms in the early 20th century. My grandfather once asked me to stop whistling to a tune, as whistling was too closely associated in his mind with the murderous Cossacks who whistled when they regularly descended on his small village.

It did not take much connectivity to go from the nightmarish imagination of what befell my grandparents and their families to the sometimes feverish fight as a young man against any injustice visible to me. After all, joining in the struggles against war or for fairness, equity and human rights meant quite logically also fighting for the safety and security of Jews.

If Canada became a better place for the homeless and poor, gays and lesbians, refugees and immigrants and people afflicted with AIDS, then it should necessarily be a better and safer place for Jews, too. Such motivation is classical, even ideological, in Jewish history and I was not particularly different.

As it happens, my time in Winnipeg from the 1950s to 1970s was replete with incidents of outright anti-Semitism and more than mere verbal taunts and insults. And so later, I sought out human rights organizations and the political left, thinking they would be free of anti-Jewish sentiments, a safe place to form alliances with other like-minded people.

I have been somewhat disappointed in this regard.

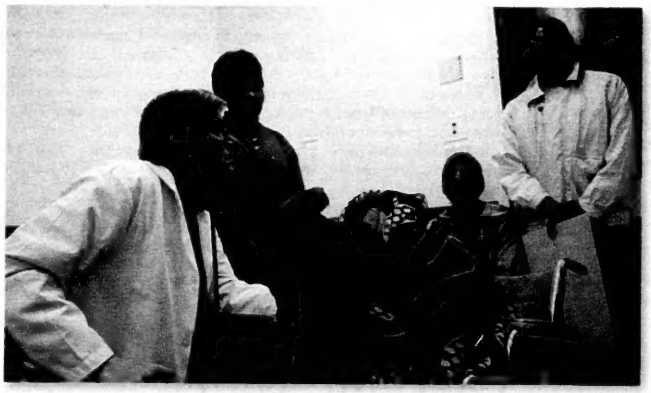
Nonetheless, it was historical and contemporary anti-Semitism that impelled me into activism as a young adult, affirming Jewish values of empathy for others, resistance and protest.

Quite accidentally, I was thrust into the world of AIDS as the epidemic exploded in Toronto in the early 1980s. I was one of about a dozen downtown doctors who had large numbers of gay men and some injection drug users in our medical practices. From the beginning, the number of Jewish physicians who treated people with AIDS was greater than their proportion in the general community of physicians. This was no accident but rather an example of the paramount value Judaism places on life and the worthiness of all lives.

Rage reigned in the early days of the AIDS epidemic, and many AIDS physicians supported their patients who fought discrimination and the wholly inadequate government response to the epidemic. A slogan enunciated by AIDS activists at the time was "Silence Equals Death," a three-word admonition that is just as applicable to the genocides perpetrated against the Jewish people and is a call for the Jewish duty to protest injustice.

As Rabbi Ed Elkin of the First Nareyever Synagogue in Toronto taught me, even Abraham protested and negotiated with God over the impending destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, showing us that protest is part of Jewish history from the start.

In 2004 and 2005, I spent more than seven months working at a rural AIDS clinic in the small landlocked sub-Saharan African country of Lesotho, in which one of four adults is infected with HIV. The name of the clinic is Tsepong, which means "Place of Hope." With others, I organized a Passover celebration in my compound house, to which I had affixed a mezuzah upon my arrival. I am not sure exactly why I attached the mezuzah to the compound door except I guess that I came to Lesotho not only as an AIDS physician but as a Jewish physician.



Dr. Philip B. Berger at his clinic in Tsepong, Lesotho

Three of the 11 Passover guests – Max, Sharon and Eli (not their real names) – were Jewish American Peace Corps volunteers who were engaged in tough community education work, on the ground, in Lesotho. And they came from wildly different Jewish backgrounds.

Max was a former yeshiva student who spent nine years studying in Jerusalem. He returned to the United States and joined the Peace Corps. He travelled 10 hours through Lesotho mountains and valleys to get to the seder.

Sharon was raised in the Conservative stream of Judaism and travelled four hours from her remote village where she taught school.

And Eli was a thoroughly assimilated secular Jew raised in the wealthy Riverdale area of New York City and lived close by our compound.

At the seder, Max gave a two-hour rabbinic-like commentary on the Passover. It was a bit difficult for Eli, who never experienced a seder longer than 10 minutes, and somewhat reminiscent of my childhood seders, he could hardly wait to eat.

A Catholic nun lit the candles and made a blessing. The other guests, including a Canadian health care worker, who knew the story of Moses, sort of, but none knew it was found in the Passover Haggadah.

Jewish values do have a universality.

These three Jewish Peace Corps volunteers from their respective streams of Jewish tradition sought out Jewishness from their humanitarian endeavours. Their actions in social justice led them directly back to their Jewish roots and Passover's celebration of liberation and freedom. It was more than just company, dinner and sentimentality that brought them to the seder table. Jewishness and social justice, in the case of the Peace Corps volunteers their development work in education, are synchronous.

Actually, Jewish values are social justice values. Although it may be provocative and political to think, let alone to say on Shavuot, that the synchronicity of Jewishness and social justice applies to all Jews.

The responsibility for reducing suffering, for example in Toronto, or in faraway lands also attaches to the rich and powerful among us – even if it means that their own interests may be compromised in the pursuit of fairness, or peace, or justice.

Take for example, the establishment of robust social welfare programs to assist the poor, the hungry and the homeless in our neighbourhoods. Such programs require more than volunteer-staffed out-of-the-cold dinners and donation of clothes, both generously supported by the Jewish community. They require stable and sufficient financing only achievable through higher taxation on the wealthy in order to maintain and improve the services for those most vulnerable on our streets. These programs are really a form of wealth redistribution.

Somehow though, I suspect that a call for higher taxation would not go over too well in our homes. But when a collision arises between the values of self-interest and those of self-effacement, Jews must always choose the latter.

It is not good enough to raise funds for Jewish social services or Jewish advocacy organizations. Jewish participation in remedying local and world injustices must transcend our narrow interests and fears and reach into the territory of those who, upon a cursory glance, may appear disconnected from Jewish community affairs.

The universality of Jewish values makes all injustice our business and the duty to act applies to all of us, including the most privileged in the community. My well-to-do Jewish Peace Corps friend Eli exemplified just that.

I have learned from Rabbi Elkin and from friends that every value and principle that have guided me over the decades have a Jewish derivation, whether it be the long-established Jewish requirement to study, the maintenance of empathy, even for our enemies, or the absolute sacredness of life, so much so that Jews must breach the most entrenched observances and laws in order to save a life.

It is Jewish values, Jewish teachings – whether we are aware of them or not – that in an ontogenetic fashion always propel Jews onto the streets, into the demonstrations, to fight for freedom, to oppose injustice.

And maybe, just maybe to end the whistling.

Philip Berger is chief of the department of family and community medicine at St. Michael's Hospital in Toronto, the medical director of the Inner City Health Program and a member of the board of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

What's Your #ish?

No, it's not a typo. #ish is an amalgam of a hash tag, a secret symbol comprehensible only to users of Twitter, and the funnier sounding half of the word Jewish. "What's your #ish?" is the slogan of a $300,000 marketing campaign aimed at 18-to-35-year-olds, which invites young Jews to offer serious and silly descriptions of their "#ish" – their connection to Judaism.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Actually, no question could be more serious. Jews need to know why they're Jewish. This question is the question and needs to be discussed by everyone, from parents and children to the Jewish federations' boards of directors.

But in many ways, this question is a sad question, or to be more precise, a question that elicits absurd answers. I know this is a humorous campaign. At the same time, it's still distressing to consider that for many people, Jewish identity has been reduced to an absurd caricature, a homage to kitschy icons: bubbies, corned beef and Woody Allen.

The Jewish community has done an awful job articulating "what's our #ish?" Instead of embracing a serious Jewish mission, we have poured our energies into building nostalgia based institutions. We forget that Judaism is not the shvitz, a pastrami sandwich, or Fiddler on the Roof. Judaism is more than lox and bagels, it's a mission.

That Judaism is a mission is the one idea embraced by serious Jews of every stripe, from socialist to haredi. (What each believes that mission to be is another story!) When Abraham begins to wander, it's not in search of a better cholent or a good joke. Abraham was pursuing a mission.

So, what's my #ish?

Dr. Rick Hodes works for the Joint Distribution Committee in Ethiopia. One day, a young Muslim woman, Merdya Abdisa, came in with a tumour the size of an orange around her eye. Hodes sent her file to leading surgeons worldwide, but they all say it's impossible to operate.

One day, while visiting Minneapolis, Hodes overslept and arrived at shul after services. The rabbi was still there, studying with another man. Hodes chatted with the rabbi and his student. It turned out the student was a doctor, Eric Nussbaum, who had the precise specialty needed to do Abdisa's surgery. After looking at pictures of her, Nussbaum said: "I'd love to try to help this lady." A short time later, she was in Minneapolis having her tumour removed.

This story is a classic Jewish saga. It includes Torah, prayer, doctors and a rabbi.

Most importantly, this story is about the Jewish mission, the profound desire to change the world, from Ethiopia to Minnesota. And that's my #ish.

Educating the spoiled brats of Jewish history

Halleluyah! Natan Sharansky is trying to reform the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI). Since he became chairman of this quasi-governmental agency, uniquely poised to bridge the State of Israel with Jewish communities around the world, he has pushed an exciting new vision for the infamously bureaucratic agency.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Sharansky views the Jewish Agency as the spearhead for a global Jewish push revitalizing Jewish identity. If in the 20th century JAFI's great accomplishment was saving Jewish lives, the 21st century has to be about saving Jewish souls.

Now that may sound jarring to us, because so many of us are secular, sophisticated, technocratic and uncomfortable with "soul talk." But if we don't have the passion, if we don't see that building Jewish identity is ultimately about saving souls, then how do we get the gumption to do what must be done?

Words such as "change" and "identity" can be empty slogans, amorphous and lacking meat on the bones. Our vision of Jewish identity and our mission must be coherent, so that we know how to get traction on this important issue.

The modern Zionist movement tried to solve "the Jewish problem" of the 19th century – anti-Semitism. The Jewish problem for most (not all) Jews today is the opposite: we are being Loved to Death. Some 2.5 million young Israelis, 1.7 million young North American Jews, and most of the 600,000 young Jews from other countries enjoy unprecedented freedom – and prosperity. But too many perceive that freedom as "negative freedom," freedom from – freedom from ties, from tradition, from community and from responsibilities (and many of their parents aren't much better). We're being loved to death in once-hostile communities that now happily celebrate our children's marriages to theirs, and we're being loved to death, because while we can enter the modern world freely, we often enter by voluntarily relinquishing our Jewish identity.

Our young people, in secular Israel and abroad, in this age of "I" not "us," are entranced by the new cosmopolitanism cross-bred with a hyper-individualism, what Sharansky calls a false choice between Jewish values and universal values. That false choice is reinforced by an equally false promise that we can transcend national boundaries, cut ourselves off from tradition and simply be islands unto ourselves, encased within our own technological test tubes.

Isn't that the Apple promise, to each his own iPod and iPhone, to each his own customized Thinkpad?

And we Jews lap it up. You know the old joke. Show me someone who says, "I'm a Christian" and you know he's Christian. Show me someone who says, "I'm a Muslim" and you know he's Muslim. Show me someone who says, "I'm just a human being" – he's Jewish.

We are, New Republic writer Leon Wieseltier says, "the spoiled brats of Jewish history," more comfortable than ever before, but more selfish and self-indulgent than ever before. Our great mass crime, Wieseltier argues, isn't intermarriage, but ignorance. One of the most educated generations in Jewish history in secular terms is one of the least educated Jewishly.

In 2008, U.S. President Barack Obama showed that liberals shouldn't be afraid of the "three Fs" – family, faith and flag. We have to build our identity on what we might call the "three mems" – mishpachah (family), morashah (heritage) and moledet (homeland). This holy trinity, if you will, roots us, consecrating our personal and national identities, teaching us about our past, inspiring us in the present and orienting us toward the future. JAFI – and other Jewish communal institutions – must express and foster this vision, with education at its core.

We can find salvation in more Jewish education, because Jewish education isn't just about learning the facts, but about mastering life. Jewish education isn't just about thinking, it's also about doing. Jewish education isn't just about understanding the world, but fixing it – tikun olam. Jewish education isn't just about skill-building, it's about identity-building. In short, Jewish education is values education – and that's the added value we need, and must provide. As Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu recently told JAFI's board of governors: "This is not an exercise in education. It's an exercise in survival."

Jews and shul – here and there

Why do Jews go to shul? There's a well-known Jewish joke: every week, Mr. Schwartz and Mr. Goldberg go to the same shul, sit in exactly the same seat next to each other, go to kiddush together and leave together. Finally, one Shabbat, the rabbi asks them, "Mr. Schwartz, Mr. Goldberg, why do you come to shul?" Schwartz answers, "Rabbi, of course I come to talk to God!" Goldberg looks at the rabbi and sheepishly says, "Rabbi, to be honest, I come to talk to Schwartz."

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

Both reasons are legitimate Jewish motives. We go to shul to express our longings in prayer, and to be part of a community expressing its longings in prayer. We go to reach out to God and to reach out to each other. We go to discover something about the Holy and to discover something about ourselves. We go to connect to the Divine and to connect to our friends. Sometimes we only achieve one, and sometimes only the other. The rare times we get both is a treat.

During this year in Jerusalem, I've had the privilege of attending many synagogues: Sephardi and Ashkenazi; Conservative, Reform, Orthodox, Reconstructionist and Jewish Renewal; shuls in multi-part harmony, with poetry readings, playing drums and in silent meditation; ones with mixed seating, separate seating, mechitzah down the middle, mechitzah in the back, and even a tri-chitzah (mixed in the middle, men and women on the opposite sides of the mixed section); as well as rural and city shuls, small local shuls and large established ones. We've even joined two shuls, the one we attend Friday night and the one we attend Saturday morning, and they're two distinct experiences.

In the Diaspora, going to synagogue is our strongest Jewish experience of the week, and maybe our only one. It provides our adult Jewish education, our Jewish social life and our holiday celebrations. Often it provides our Shabbat meals. It teaches our kids, helps our teens meet "nice Jewish kids" whom they can date, organizes tours to Jewish sites, brings in scholars for special weekends and holds concerts. Mega-synagogues boast "synaplex" services, "storatelling" and sushi Shabbat. The rabbis visit us when we're sick and comfort us when we're bereaved. The shul is part community centre, part spiritual counsellor and part Cheers, where everybody knows your name.

Of course, in Israel it's quite different. Israelis send their kids to (free!) Jewish schools. Very few synagogues have communal dinners or lunches. Even the kiddush after services is short and there's not much herring – the assumption is that everyone is invited to some sort of Shabbat meal after services. (The shul we attend has a beautiful tradition that every week someone from the shul hosts anyone who is not otherwise invited, and there's a public announcement from the bimah indicating where guests can meet the hosts. Would that every synagogue did the same.)

There are scores of youth groups, and most kids join one – you can see them on the buses on Thursday nights in their uniforms. (Yes you read correctly – teenagers in youth groups from secular to right-wing religious proudly wear uniforms.) Visiting the sick and comforting the bereaved are normative activities of everyday life for the average Israeli. There are few "gimmicks" or "shtick" to get people to come to shul. They either come or they don't – Israeli Jewish life simply does not depend on the synagogue. The synagogue is an adjunct to the daily reality of living in a Jewish state.

Yes, in Israel there's also "competition" between shuls, and people "rabbi-shop" to find the leader they most like or respect. But I find Israelis less often disappointed in their shuls, because their expectations are perhaps more realistic.

Shul isn't the be-all and end-all of Jewish life for them, and when they leave its doors, there are plenty more opportunities for Schwartz and Goldberg to talk to each other about Jewish things in a Jewish context.

The Kirshner File

Netherlands is at centre of debate on Muslim integration

As you take a stroll on Stationsweg, a non-descript street in The Hague close to Chinatown, you pass a Muslim grocery store, a mosque and an Islamic ladies' garment shop in quick succession. Muslim women clad in hijabs and black flowing robes and Pakistani men wearing salwar kameez suits and embroidered kufi hats glide by a smattering of Dutch and South American Caucasians and Africans. By all appearances, this somewhat scruffy district in The Hague – the seat of government in the Netherlands – seems inhabited mainly by Muslim immigrants.

Sheldon Kirshner in Amsterdam

If a controversial Dutch politician named Geert Wilders fares well in the June 9 general election, he will not only transform the political landscape of this bastion of multiculturalism and tolerance but send shivers of fear coursing through the Muslim community. Wilders, the leader of the Freedom party, known in Dutch as the PVV, scored major gains in municipal elections in March, winning the greatest number of seats in the town of Almere and finishing second in The Hague.

Last year, the PVV – which has nine of 150 seats in the Netherlands' parliament – won four out of 25 Dutch seats in European parliamentary elections. In next week's national election, the PVV is poised to win 27 seats, giving Wilders, who aspires to be prime minister, an opportunity to be a kingmaker in a future coalition government.

Geert Wilders

Israel's ambassador to the Netherlands, Harry Kney-Tal, suggested that Wilders is a rising star in the Dutch political firmament and "will be bigger in the future." Wilders' primary opponents will be the incumbent prime minister, Jan Peter Balkenende of the Christian Democratic Alliance and Marius Job Cohen of the Dutch Labour party.

Muslims, not to mention liberals and social democrats, will be sorely disappointed and quite apprehensive should Wilders hold the balance of power following the election. A libertarian who compares Islam to fascism and the Qur'an to Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf, Wilders is probably best known as the screenwriter and producer of Fitna, a short, polarizing film that links Qur'anic verses and radical Islamic precepts with terrorism and oppression.

Although he denies being a fascist, rejects comparisons likening him to French far-rightist politician Jean-Marie Le Pen and considers Britain's Margaret Thatcher his role model, critics have accused him of being an anti-Muslim demagogue who would stir social discord if given the chance.

Wilders' harsh critique of Islam underpins their concerns. Claiming he bears no personal animus against Muslims, Wilders, who is unabashedly pro-Israel, says, "I don't hate Muslims, I hate Islam."

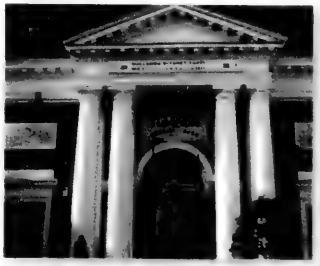
Proceeding from the assumption that moderate Islam is non-existent, he believes that Islam is as much a religion as an ideology. As he recently told a Canadian correspondent from the Globe and Mail, "As I see it, the aim of the Islamic ideology is to dominate and to submit the western societies to their belief, and this is unlike the other religions. I say that Islam is not another branch on the tree of religions. It has to be put in the corner of totalitarian ideologies. That's why I compare it with communism and fascism."

To Wilders, the Qur'an "incites hatred and killing and therefore has no place in our legal order." Having urged Muslims to "tear out half of the Qur'an if they [wish] to stay in the Netherlands," Wilders has branded Mohammed the Prophet as "the devil" who would be "hunted down today as a terrorist."

Claiming that Islam is "a Trojan-horse" doctrine that commands Muslims to immigrate to non-Muslim countries, procreate and take control, Wilders holds that Muslim immigration to the Netherlands should be halted and that settled Muslim immigrants from such countries as Turkey, Morocco, Afghanistan, Iraq and Pakistan should be paid to leave.

In a reference to the nearly one million Muslims in this nation of about 16 million inhabitants, he has said, "Take walk down the street and see where this is going. You no longer feel like you are living in your own country."

Wilders is of the view that a five-year ban should be imposed on the construction of mosques and Islamic schools, that foreign imams should not be permitted to preach in existing mosques, that radical mosques should be closed, that Muslim extremists should be expelled and that a clause in the Dutch constitution guaranteeing equality should be replaced by a clause underscoring the cultural dominance of Judeo-Christian values.



A mosque in The Hague

By all accounts, Wilders formed the core of his beliefs while travelling in Israel and the Arab world. He has been quoted as saying, "We [in the West] are all Israel" and "Israel is the West's first line of defence" against radical Islam.

It also seems clear that events in the Netherlands and the rest of Europe influenced him as well.

In all probability, Wilders was deeply affected by the murder of the Dutch politician Wilhelmus Simon Petrus "Pim" Fortuyn, who branded Islam as "a backward culture" and "an extraordinary threat" and called for an end to Muslim immigration.

Fortuyn was assassinated in 2002. His assassin, Volkert van der Graaf, explained he had murdered Fortuyn to stop him from exploiting Muslims as "scapegoats."

The assassination two years later of Theo van Gogh, a film director who made Submission, a documentary critical of the treatment of women in Islam, was probably another galvanzing event.

His murderer, Mohammed Bouyeri, a 26-year-old Dutch citizen of Moroccan descent, left a note on Van Gogh's body condemning western governments, Jews and Ayaan Hirsi Ali, a Somali Muslim Dutch feminist writer and critic of Islam due to speak in Toronto on June 8. She wrote the screenplay for Submission, worked briefly with Wilders and currently lives in the United States.

The Netherlands is home to almost one million Muslims.

In the wake of Van Gogh's murder, the minister of immigration commissioned an inquiry into the radicalization of young Dutch Muslims. A report concluded that many of them feel disconnected from their immigrant parents and Dutch society.

The violent deaths of Fortuyn and Van Gogh heightened the growing debate in Europe on the integration, of lack thereof, of the Muslim minority.

Last November, a majority of Swiss citizens voted to ban the construction of minarets. Two months ago, French President Nicolas Sarkozy said he would submit a bill to ban the wearing of the full veil in public places.

In the Netherlands, these issues form part of the current election campaign. The Dutch Labour party, led by Cohen, the fourth Jewish mayor of Amsterdam, is widely seen as a moderating voice in the debate over Muslim integration.

Wilders, who appointed the Jewish candidate Giddy Markuszower to run on his electoral list, has dismissed Cohen as a throwback to outdated multiculturalism.

The 40,000 Jews of the Netherlands are watching developments carefully.

Ruben Vis, the secretary general of the Amsterdam-based Central Jewish Organization, disagrees with Wilders' position that Muslim immigration should be halted. "That's racism," he said.

But Vis – whose uncle Leonard Vis lives in Toronto – is concerned by the physical and verbal attacks by Muslims on Jews, a troubling phenomenon that escalated during Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip in January 2009. "We face some problems from Muslims in the Netherlands," he said.

The Dutch prime minister concurs, having been quoted as saying that Jews and Muslims need to work together to ease tensions.

Mother of slain IDF soldier addresses local groups

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Toronto-born mother of a slain Israel Defence Forces soldier is cautioning Diaspora Jewry not to take for granted what Israel means to them.

While on a speaking tour of synagogues and Jewish schools in Toronto in April, Cheryl Mandel recalled the life and death of her middle son, Daniel, who was killed while leading an elite anti-terrorism unit – the Palsar Nachal – on a mission in Nablus on April 15, 2003.

Speaking to The CJN by phone from Israel last week, she said the death of any IDF soldier is cause for Jews worldwide to take notice of the crucial role soldiers play in keeping Israel alive and well. It's a message she took with her to Toronto this past Yom Hazikaron.

She said whether Jews worldwide realize it or not, their ability put on kippot or to eat at a kosher restaurant in the Diaspora is all thanks to IDF soldiers "keeping Israel strong so there won't be another Shoah. Don't deceive yourself otherwise. We need to have our young people in the army defending our country."

Mandel and her husband, David, made aliyah from Toronto 23 years ago, to Gush Etzion in the West Bank, where they raised their five children.

According to Mandel, Daniel was a model soldier who took his comrades under his wing to train them, protect them and teach them "what they were fighting for."

She said Daniel was a man with a passion and talent for music and academics, and with an indomitable spirit. All that was taken away in a flash of gunfire.

Although she grew up secular, Mandel said she gravitated toward Orthodoxy and eventually became observant before moving to Israel.

She said she feels her upbringing helps her connect with both religious and secular Jews when she spreads her message about Israel.

"What happens in Israel affects every Jew in the world. But when I was secular, I had a sense that I didn't feel anything in Israel had anything to do with me or what my life was," she said.

"What I say now is that my son Daniel and all the [IDF] soldiers have something in their lives that they feel is important enough to die for: the existence of the Jewish state. They do it not just because of compulsory conscription, but because they understand what happened to the Jewish people when there wasn't a Jewish state."

She said whenever she gets asked whether it's hard to be in Israel on Yom Hazikaron, she always answers, "It's hard to be in Israel on Yom Hazikaron. It's also hard not to be in Israel on Yom Hazikaron."

Mandel added that in her opinion, Yom Hazikaron isn't really for the grieving families of those who died in defence of Israel. Rather, the memorial day is for the rest of the nation.

"Because for the families, the loss is with us all the time," she said.

Mandel was invited here by Mizrachi Organization of Canada to speak about her experience as the parent of a slain soldier. She said she hopes to come back to Toronto and speak to Jewish students on campuses in and around the city to spread her message.

Everybody wins at Chabad Youth awards dinner

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Teens for the Community (TFC) isn't just about giving high school students a way to complete their mandatory community service hours, said Rabbi Shmuli Nachlas, director of the Chabad Youth Network, which runs the program.

"At the beginning, the incentive might be the hours," he said, "but in the bigger picture, they end up enjoying the program, loving what they're doing, and getting a lot of self-gratification."

Local MPP Peter Shurman presents a certificate of recognition to Josh Freedman, president of Teens for the Community Thornhill.

The 70 students involved in TFC were recognized at a May 26 dinner at Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation.

Each volunteer received the same award regardless of his or her position. In addition to a certificate, they were also presented with a red zip-up sweatshirt bearing the Chabad Youth Network logo.

"Everybody did a lot, and so we wanted to thank each person for their individual work," said Michael Saskin, president of TFC Forest Hill.

The program, which has three divisions – in Thornhill, Forest Hill, and Toronto – is designed to give students a way to give back to the community.

The students were responsible for organizing several events, such as creating blankets for hospitalized children, baking loaves of challah for the homeless and organizing a bingo bash for the elderly.

"The work we do is very fulfilling," Saskin said.

Rabbi Nachlas said students used to approach him looking for ways to complete their 40 hours of community service required for high school graduation. Chabad Youth Network would accept the volunteers and ask for their help in menial tasks such as paperwork.

However, Rabbi Nachlas said he wanted to give teens a more meaningful way to fulfil the requirement, and to show them the fun in giving back to the community around them.

Josh Freedman, president of TFC Thornhill, said he's been involved in the program from the beginning and has enjoyed watching the numbers double since last year's recognition dinner.

One of the nicest parts of TFC is recruiting students and helping them find meaningful ways to help the community, he said.

"Don't make community service a burden," he said. "Everyone's fully capable of taking a small part of their day and helping someone else."

Both Freedman and Saskin said their favourite event was a basketball tournament whose entry fees went to help enrich the life of a boy with cancer. The players also wrote messages to the boy, although they did not know him.

Keeping giver and receiver anonymous allowed the teens to fulfil the highest form of tzedakah, said Thornhill MPP Peter Shurman, who spoke at the dinner.

Shurman said it's rare to see such quick growth in a charity group, which he described as "excellent" because it invests in the students, providing them with a foundation of skills they need to become charity-driven adults.

"It's creating leaders of tomorrow," Rabbi Nachlas said. "They're creating light in this world and dispelling darkness."

Parade should be 'free of any hateful messaging'

"It is the right decision, but it was not done from the goodness of [Pride board members'] hearts. It was forced upon them by the threat of stakeholders standing up to them after my film was made," he told The CJN.

"It is a wake-up call that if you are silent, hate will thrive and gain ground in any perverse arena. It speaks volumes that in the same week two gay men in Malawi were sentenced to 14 years hard labour for being gay, [QuAIA remained] obsessed with demonizing Israel... a gay rights leader."

Len Rudner, Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario regional director, said his group recognized that Pride had to make a "difficult decision," but ultimately made the right call.

"There is no place for this kind of equivalency in the parade. To say that Israel is an apartheid state is just factually wrong," he said.

B'nai Brith Canada also commended Pride's decision to ban "the hateful term" from all facets of the festival.

In a statement, Pride Toronto said it didn't want to take any chances that it would lose funding and prestige for its marquee event, adding that 2010 marks the organization's 30th anniversary and "this will not be the year we see our festival cancelled because of any one specific message."

Ngai and fellow Pride co-chair Genevieve D'Iorio added: "Our organization works diligently to find a balance between the varied voices brought to the steps of Pride. We welcome the space for debates and discussions. We hope that over time, there will be a way for people to use language that can promote education and knowledge over anger and hatred. This path is necessary for sustainability, to keep our festival's voice alive and heard worldwide."

Justine Apple, executive director of Kulanu Toronto – which represents the city's Jewish lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered community and will march in the parade – said Pride's decision was long overdue.

"We're extremely happy this has happened. The parade should be free of any hateful messaging. Let QuAIA go demonstrate in front of City Hall. Pride is not the right arena to spread intolerance, discrimination and divisiveness," she said.

Apple said she hopes that with this group banned, more Kulanu supporters will attend the parade and march without "fear of violence and intimidation," something she said kept many potential Jewish marchers away from the parade last year.

Elle Flanders, spokesperson for QuAIA was outraged by the decision.

"In a democracy, you may not like what we have to say, but we have every right to say it. Martin Gladstone and cohorts have effectively brought 30 years of a censorship-free Pride to a close," she told The CJN via e-mail. "Pride was effectively intimidated and made a decision that will have repercussions for any group whose political leanings may be contrary to others."

In response to criticisms levelled against QuAIA by Gladstone and other pro-Israel advocates that the group is single-mindedly obsessed with Israel, Flanders, who is Jewish, said this perception is false.

"Many of us marched in solidarity when the Iranian government hanged three men accused of homosexuality last year and for the mass arrests of Egyptian gay men on their Nile cruise, [for] example. I don't remember seeing Martin Gladstone or his supporters at either of those rallies," she said.

She said QuAIA still plans to march in the parade "in some form."

Beth Tikvah launches summer program series

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Beth Tikvah Synagogue is kicking off its second summer series with a debate on the existence of God.

The June 10 event is the first of a four-part series that deals with prayer.

Rabbi Jarrod Grover

"Prayer is the core of what a synagogue does," said Rabbi Jarrod Grover, Beth Tikvah assistant rabbi. "The debate is very important because you can't talk about prayer if you can't have a serious discussion about God."

On the side arguing for God's existence is Rabbi Dow Marmur, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple. On the opposing side is Robert Buckman, president of the Humanist Association of Canada, an organization that promotes separation of religion and public policy.

Moderating the event will be TV and radio personality Michael Coren, who Rabbi Grover said will bring a Catholic perspective to the debate.

While he won't officially participate in the debate, Rabbi Grover said he'll probably share his views "at least several times."

Although some people have complained that a synagogue should not advertise a program questioning God's existence, Rabbi Grover said the debate is designed to stimulate people's thoughts.

He described once seeing the People's Church located on Sheppard Avenue advertising a similar debate.

"If evangelicals can do it," he said, "then so can we."

Furthermore, he said events such as this can attract younger Jewish adults, as well as people who are not absolute in their views on God's existence, not for people firm on either side of the spectrum.

"I think most people are in-between," he said.

Although he admits the synagogue has a vested interest in the religious perspective of the debate, both sides will be given a fair opportunity to state their case. The goal is not to persuade one side to the other, he said, and there will probably be no clear winner.

"The only outcome we want is for people to think about the topic," he said.

The series runs from June 10 to June 24 and also includes an alternative Shabbat service focusing on Jewish meditation, a screening of Ben Feferman's short film called The Wandering Jew, and a lecture by author Denyse O'Leary addressing scientific research that suggests spirituality is hard-wired into human beings.

The idea behind the program is to engage adults in an intellectual environment during a time of the year when most other synagogues don't hold events, because they believe most people are busy or on vacation, Rabbi Grover said.

However, the synagogue's success with its 2009 summer series showed him there are people interested in participating.

"We're not doing it to make a penny," he said, explaining that each event costs no more than $5. "We're doing this because we believe in the program."

Conservative group holds second convention

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues (CCCS) will hold its second annual convention June 11 to 13 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

The CCCS was formed in 2008 with four Toronto congregations as constituents – Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Beth Tzedec Congregation and Beth Sholom Synagogue. Aside from Beth Sholom, which was unaffiliated, the congregations had left the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, the umbrella body for about 700 Conservative congregations in North America, earlier in the year.

Currently, the organization has eight member shuls. In addition to the original constituents, members include Congregation Beth Shalom in Ottawa, Beth Torah Congregation in Toronto, B'Nai Shalom Congregation of Halton-Peel, and Montreal's Congregation Shaar Shalom.

The convention's keynote speaker, Jack Wertheimer, professor of American Jewish history at the Jewish Theological Seminary, will address participants at Shabbat morning services and lunch, as well as on Saturday evening.

Also, Debbie Fink, a Maryland-based children's author and performer, will speak on the Saturday evening before services. Her talk is titled, "Roots and Limbs: our multi-generational involvement in shaping Jewish identity."

Organizers are hoping for about 100 attendees, according to Rivy Blass, convention co-chair with Bernie Shiner.

Blass said she was hoping for an exchange of ideas among participating synagogues, and that participants would be able to take ideas back to their boards so they could address practical issues like Jewish education, how to attract volunteers, and how to involve families.

Synagogue youth directors will share program ideas with other participants, she added.

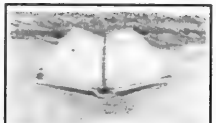
Reflections on being a rabbi

By RABBI MICHAEL DOLGIN

During my two-year term as president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR), more people have asked me about the movie A Serious Man than have asked me about this group of colleagues. Rabbis are common "characters" in stories, but as real people and professionals, they're easily misunderstood. As one of my last official acts as leader of the TBR, I would like to debunk some of the myths that commonly circulate about Toronto's rabbinic community (and certainly extend beyond our city as well.)



Rabbinic Reflections

1. Rabbis with different Jewish perspectives don't respect one another. This assertion is offered regularly in our community, both implicitly and explicitly. The nature of the Toronto Board of Rabbis itself indicates otherwise. Conservative, Orthodox, Reconstructionist and Reform rabbis (to name them alphabetically) share regular meetings and communal duties. We recognize that the variety of our approaches is a treasure for our community. We learn with each other and from each other. We're proud to be represented at community events by our president, whatever type of ordination he or she has. When we were called upon to provide a pluralistic panel for a community-wide teacher development day, we had too many volunteers who wished to be co-presenters.

2. Rabbis of different flavours can't agree on community issues. True, TBR colleagues hold different opinions on matters of Jewish law. Our by-laws state clearly that the focus of our organization is on shared concerns that affect all facets of our community. On such broad issues, we're often able to speak with one voice. For example, we agree that the current inability of our community to provide a quality Jewish education to every Jewish child is unacceptable. Education and Jewish continuity aren't products of large fancy new buildings. They come instead from strong investment in developing well-trained, community-minded teachers; seeing that Jewish education (especially day school education) is easily accessible rather than absurdly expensive; looking beyond day school programs to strongly support synagogue-based child and family programs and informal education, and aligning community resources to actively encourage affiliation.

3. Rabbis and rabbinic sub-groups are focused on the needs of their own synagogues, organizations and movements. Our community is lucky to have distinct Conservative, Orthodox and Reform rabbinic sub-groups. Each one represents an authentic Jewish voice, challenging us to live an informed, conscious Jewish life. Even with our disagreements, rabbis are called to serve the Jewish people and the wider community. Leading the pluralistic TBR, I have been occasionally frustrated or even disappointed. But primarily, I have been inspired by the way my colleagues are Jewish leaders first and narrow ideologues last.

Whether rabbis are newly ordained or recently retired, male or female, serving in congregations, schools or organizations, their primary goal is to strengthen the fabric of our tradition and our community.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin is spiritual leader of Temple Sinai in Toronto.

The yod connection

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The Torah portion Shlach contains the story of the spies sent to reconnoiter the Land of Israel and report back. There's a question about whose idea it was to send the spies – the Torah says God told Moses "shlach lecha," "send for you," an odd construct in both Hebrew and English. It's not a surprise that there's no agreement among scholars as to whose bright idea this was.

The problem with the spies is that 12 men enter Israel, tour around for 40 days and return with a horrible, slanderous report. They describe Israel as a land "that eats its inhabitants." In other words, rather than the earth producing grains to feed its people, this particular land does the reverse: it feeds on its people. It devours them. The only way a piece of land can do this is through death – the inhabitants of this land die quickly and the earth eats them through burials. One can hardly imagine a more gruesome description of a land.

The spies continue to malign its inhabitants by declaring that the spies appeared like bugs in the eyes of the natives. Since this bit of information was never actually communicated to them, the spies clearly projected their own insecurities into the mouths of others and then accused them of this demeaning perspective.

In fact, it's the spies' words to Israel that result in God's decree that no one from that generation will enter Israel. This is the event that determines the 40 years Israel will spend in the wilderness as each person lives out their natural life and dies in the desert. Even Moses will be denied entry to Israel. This text is truly one of the more heartbreaking moments of Torah, when we realize how easily we can be swayed by the slandering nature of a mob and how it will always cost us dearly.

Midrashic Moments

Yet in the midst of this dramatic moment of our ancient history, there's a small detail that inspires us. Just before Moses sent the spies on their mission, he changes the name of one spy. The original list of men has Hoshaiya, son of Nun. Within two verses, Moses changes the name of this spy to Yehoshuah, or Joshua. It is Joshua and his partner, Caleb, who will return and tell the truth about the land. It is this Joshua who will ultimately lead the next generation of Israelites into the land of Israel.

The change in name – adding the Hebrew letter yod – seems so tiny a nuance, but the midrash understands its monumental meaning. Previously, the Torah has shown us name changes that come from God or an angel, but this one comes from Moses. The obvious question: where did Moses get the authority to add the letter yod, a letter from God's personal name, into the name of Joshua. The midrash teaches us that Moses wasn't initiating a name change, but completing one.

In the book of Genesis, God changes the first Matriarch Sarai's name to Sarah by removing the letter yod and adding the letter "hey." The midrash asks at that point what happens to the letter yod, and it answers that the yod rose before God weeping that it was removed from the name of such a righteous leader. God comforts the yod, telling it to be patient, for one day it will take its place again in the name of a righteous leader. That day is in our Torah portion, when Moses adds this same yod to the name of Joshua.

Sarah was the first Jewish person to be buried in the land of Israel. It's her body that has merged with the land and that will provide foundation and stability for all her children forever. To malign the land is to insult Sarah to her core. Joshua could never do that. The yod from the first Jewish Matriarch moves from her name to the name of the leader that will preserve her honour and lead her children to settle in their land. Joshua will bring her children home.

Jewish Life

The Temple, Part II

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The Temple has inextricably been linked with the fortunes of the Jewish people, the visible heirs and descendants of ancient Israel. The Temple's eras of splendour have mirrored the high point of Jewish civilization, while its destruction has seen the dispersal of the Jews and their persecution. It has been the symbol of our faith and aspiration for the last 3,000 years.

The First Temple was built by David's son, Solomon, with the help of King Hiram of the Phoenician city of Tyre. In addition to being a staunch ally of Solomon, Hiram had at his disposal the lofty cedars of Lebanon, located in the mountains behind Tyre. Furthermore Hiram sent his builders and craftsmen, who were renowned throughout the Mediterranean, to help Solomon build his iconic house of worship.

This close relationship should come as no surprise since Phoenician and Hebrew are almost identical linguistically. The relationship between the Hebrew kingdoms and the Phoenicians would be sealed from time to time with dynastic marriages, such as that between Ahab, king of Israel, and the infamous Phoenician princess, Jezebel. It was also Phoenician craftsmen who built Ahab's notorious ivory palace, for which he was cursed by the great prophet Elijah.

Ultimately, the Phoenicians, the southern kingdom of Judah, and the northern kingdom of Israel would be severely harassed by the upcoming superpower of the day, Assyria, that would ultimately destroy the northern kingdom in 722/721 BCE. Archeology has vividly highlighted these events at the northern capital of Samaria. There was a major excavation there by the British during their mandate in the 1930s. The excavation team included the, English archeologist, Kathleen Kenyon, who would go on to win fame for her work at Jericho in the 1950s and Jerusalem in the 1960s

Despite a traumatic siege of Jerusalem by the Assyrians in 701 BCE, the southern kingdom of Judah would survive for another 115 years. Once more archeology has provided evidence for these events. The city of Lachish, which guarded the road to Jerusalem, was destroyed by the Assyrians in 701 BCE and the Babylonians, when they attacked more than 100 years later. Both the British excavation of the 1930s, and Israeli excavations of the 1970s and 1980s, led by the noted Tel Aviv University archeologist David Ussishkin, have provided vivid testimony to this fact.

In Jerusalem, King Hezekiah of Judah built a tremendous fortification now known as the "broad wall," which was uncovered in the old city by the legendary Israeli archeologist Nachman Avigad after the Six Day War.

Another of Hezekiah's accomplishments was building the water tunnel that still snakes underneath the City of David.

Josiah, Hezekiah's grandson, whom some consider to be the prototype for the Messiah, found a "lost" part of the Torah nearby in the vicinity of the Temple. Many scholars believe this to be the book of Deuteronomy.

The Temple itself was cleansed and rededicated by Josiah. Yet despite his messianic demeanour and saintly behaviour, Josiah was killed in 605 BCE, at the battle of Megiddo, by the Egyptian pharaoh Necho. Both his kingdom and its Temple would not survive him for long as the Babylonians descended on the kingdom of Judah.

I vividly saw the results of the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple 2,500 years later in 1982, while I was involved with the City of David excavations in Jerusalem. The ash layer from the conflagration that consumed the Temple on that fateful day in 586 BCE was a metre thick in places. But what impressed me most as I stood among the debris of the Babylonian destruction was the miracle of faith and perseverance that were demonstrated nearby as Jewish cranes were rebuilding our ancient homeland, while the Babylonians had been relegated to the dustbin of history.

A web of Jewish ethics

While most Jewish homes have welcomed the web, its presence does pose some difficult – and at times, some surprising – ethical questions. Thankfully, Judaism predates the Internet by a few thousand years and is able to offer advice about the Internet's thornier questions. Here is a sampling.

Is it permitted to read e-mail that has mistakenly ended up in your in-box?

Rabbi Doniel Neustadt quotes 11th-century Rabbeinu Gershom who enacted several halachic rulings, including the prohibition against reading other people's private mail. In a modern context, Rabbi Neustadt writes, "There does not seem to be any justification for differentiating between a letter sealed in an envelope and intended for the eyes of the recipient only and an electronic communication intended for the recipient only; in both cases it is forbidden for one to read another person's mail." [http://bit.ly/jweb21]

Is there anything wrong with downloading songs from the Internet without paying?

Rabbi Asher Meir of the Business Ethics Center of Jerusalem mentions that our sages were scrupulous that tolls had to be paid to compensate builders of bridges and roads. "Copying a song from the Internet is like making a detour around the toll booth. Even if you don't get a ticket, you've taken a free ride on someone else's investment." [http://bit.ly/jweb22]

Other questions addressed by Rabbi Meir follow.

- Can I sell my term papers to an online service?
- When is it unethical to collect and sell user data from the Internet?
- Can I tap into a neighbour's wireless Internet service? [http://bit.ly/jweb24]

What about blogging?

Not surprisingly, Rabbi Gil Student, founder of the Hirhurim blog, feels that blogs can serve a valid purpose. However, he does acknowledge in a lengthy essay that there definitely are pitfalls and areas that should be avoided when blogging. For example, in terms of lashon hara (gossip), he tries to define when it may be acceptable to write negative stories about public figures. [http://bit.ly/jweb25]

Is it permissible to keep a website that sells items open on Shabbat?

Rabbi Shlomo Dichovsky looks at several halachic issues, including, are you assisting someone to violate Shabbat by leaving your website open for business? He cites an earlier ruling that allows pop machines to operate on Shabbat because the machines are not inherently forbidden. In this case, "you should place a notice on the website advising customers that all transactions are completed after Shabbat." After examining several issues, Rabbi Dichovsky concludes that he cannot forbid keeping websites open for sales on Shabbat but does feel there is a negative "taste" to the practice. [http://bit.ly/jweb28]

Is Googling someone – a date or new business associate – an invasion of privacy?

The Torah forbids idle gossip: "Don't go as a talebearer among your people" (Leviticus 19:16) while the Talmud states that "loss of privacy (literally, damage through seeing) is a kind of damage." He then adds this piece of advice: "I believe that it is a bad idea to 'Google' someone before a first date… It is likely to harm the mystery and romance of making a new acquaintance, to create an awkward asymmetry in the knowledge each individual has about the other, and also to create preconceptions that will be an obstacle to creating an objective judgment of the date."

Islamic doctrine spells danger for Jews: author

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Forget all the things you know, or think you know, about the Arab-Israeli conflict. It's not about land, it's not about borders, it's not about a two-state solution.

The root of the dispute is simpler and more intractable, according to a sharia scholar and convert to Christianity. The source of the conflict is Islamic doctrine and that faith's longstanding antipathy towards Jews, said lecturer and researcher Sam Solomon.

Solomon, author of the recently-released Al-Yahud: Eternal Islamic Enmity and The Jews, said the problem between Jews and Palestinians is centuries old. "The issue of Israel and Palestinians is a crisis of relationship started way back in the seventh century by Muhammad and his treatment of the Jews and his revelation. These are eternal."

Solomon, an adviser to European parliamentarians on Islam, is in Toronto this week as part of a three-city lecture tour, along with author Bat Ye'or. In addition to a lecture at the Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue on Thursday, they will address audiences in Ottawa and London.

Solomon, who was trained in sharia (Islamic) law for 15 years before converting to Christianity, said the Qur'an is replete with derogatory references to Jews. Following Muhammad's initial condemnation of Jews, who rejected his religious claims, Jews lived by sufferance within Islamic lands.

While there were at times warm personal relationships between Muslims and Jews, Islamic doctrine placed Jews in a position of inferiority to Muslims.

"There is an eternal conflict in Islam versus the Jews," Solomon said. As Muslim theologians see it, "the only solution is for the Jews to convert to Islam."

Under Islamic doctrine, neither Jews nor Christians are accepted as equals to Muslims, he said. That sort of contemptuous attitude is hard on western ears, and some find it too disturbing to be true, he acknowledged

"If you try to analyze this, our analysis is to see it through a Judeo-Christian prism, and it doesn't match. But it's not an intellectual issue. It's a spiritual issue."

Solomon said the advance of Islam around the world is likewise part of the religion's doctrine and mirrors Muhammad's move from Mecca to Medina, "an Islamic takeover." This is happening today, where even small Muslim populations can exert great influence over larger communities and stifle criticism of Islam, a restriction on the traditional right to free speech.

Bat Ye'or

In Britain, sharia courts make decisions that are legally binding, polygamy is ignoredand Muslim women experience reduced rights.

"I'm sorry to be the bearer of bad news, but this is the reality," Solomon said.

Bat Ye'or, who was born in Egypt but whose family was expelled in 1957, said Muslim scholars foresee a condition of "dhimmitude" for non-Muslim people. Dhimmitude, she explained, "is the condition that was imposed by sharia laws to non-Muslim peoples vanquished by jihad."

Jews, Christians, Hindus and Zoroastrians (in Persia) who withstood the pressure to convert to Islam "could keep their religion on condition they would submit to humiliating regulations and buy the right to live by paying a tax mentioned in the Qur'an called the jizyah."

If they didn't pay, they could be killed, or reduced to slavery or have their children taken into slavery, she said.

Even today in Egypt, it's very difficult for the country's Coptic Christian minority to build a new church, and Christians live in insecurity, with many attacked, she said.

Ye'or, whose name was taken from a biblical reference and means Daughter of the Nile, disputed the claim that Islam is the religion of peace. "For non-Muslims, things are different," she said.

"Islam developed and expanded by wars of aggression and expansion. That's part of the Islamic religion."

Islam continues to expand in Europe and the West, though not through war. Now, it's "peaceful expansion through immigration."

Muslims today are bending the concept of multiculturalism to permit application of sharia law, as in Britain, and to prohibit criticism of Islam and Muslims' treatment of women, she said.

The success in forestalling criticism of Islam demonstrates "we are living under dhimmitude and the rules of sharia without even knowing it."

Ye'or, author of Eurabia: The Euro-Arab Axis and Islam and Dhimmitude: Where Civilizations Collide, called for careful vetting of immigrants from Islamic countries so as to "not bring those who hate our system and want to destroy it" while allowing in "those who want to integrate and who are being persecuted."

Solomon's and Ye'or's lectures were sponsored by the International Free Press Society-Canada and the Free Thinking Film Society.

Gryfe family celebrates 100 years in Canada

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

In 1910, Sam Gryfe arrived on the shores of Canada from his hometown of Botosani, Romania.

One hundred years later, more than 100 people from four generations of his family reunited to celebrate his life, and to meet and reconnect with long-lost family.

The Gryfe name is familiar to many Toronto Jews, whether it's from Mark Gryfe's involvement in the Baycrest Foundation, the popular bagels from Gryfe's Bagel Bakery or the many other prominent Gryfes in the Jewish community.

The family gathered May 23 to shmooze, eat some bagels and schmaltz herring, and sing the family theme song, which Mark Gryfe developed at a smaller family reunion as part of his son's bar mitzvah about 12 years ago.

"To Gryfe, to Gryfe, L'chaim," they sang to the tune of the famous track from the musical Fiddler on the Roof. The lyrics were projected onto a screen so the more distant relatives could sing along, said Elaine Lightstone, Sam Gryfe's granddaughter.

The poster of the family tree was huge, extending more than 30 feet even with a small font size, she said.

Cyril Gryfe played an instrumental role in connecting the family tree, which he posted at the reunion for all the relatives to see, Lightstone said.

The family has branched out of the city, reaching as far as California.

Cyril Gryfe found the California clan through the Internet while he was researching the genealogy of his family, Lightstone said, and although they had only met Cyril Gryfe once before, three generations of this branch came for the reunion.

Moishe Gryfe, who runs the namesake bakery started by his father, said the best part was seeing "how diversified [the] family has become over the 100 years."

"The legacy that he left was really quite incredible," he said.

Lightstone said it was an amazing experience to meet this family that she never knew existed.

The day was marked with sunshine and celebrations. One display showed the family's Romanian heritage, describing the foods that Sam Gryfe's wife, Molly, would have served. They included chickpeas, schmaltz herring, salmon patties and baked carp.

And of course, the reunion meal included Gryfe's bagels and pizzas.

"You can't imagine it, we had so much food," Lightstone said.

The bagels also had a role in the entertainment.

"We had a jar of bagel pieces and people had to guess how many pieces were in the jar," Lightstone said.

There were also quizzes for the children with questions such as when Gryfe's bagels were first made and how much a loaf of bread cost at the time, she said.

"People didn't seem in a hurry to go home," she said.

She described one relative as Sam Gryfe's sister's grandson, who is currently a resident at Baycrest.

She said his nurses told her that he had the best time.

"He was practically dancing off his wheelchair," she said.

Although there are no more reunions in the works at the moment, Lightstone said there will probably be another one.

"I hope it's not 100 years, but give us a little time to figure that out," she said.

Longtime teacher retires from the classroom

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

After 34 years at Associated Hebrew Schools, Esther Etigson is retiring to spend more time in Israel, where her son and young grandchildren live.

The veteran teacher, who is also an artist, is planning her final show here on June 13.

In an interview at Etigson's Thornhill home, where her acrylics and watercolours vie for space with packed cartons, she said she's excited about the upcoming changes in her life.

Etigson, 60, who was widowed at a young age, is heading to Modi'in, between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, but plans to divide her time between Israel and Toronto, where her in-laws still live.

A native of Morocco who made aliyah with her family at age six months, Etigson has lived in Toronto since 1969, with the exception of a year-long sabbatical in the mid-1980s.

Nature and Judaism are recurring themes in her art

She originally came to Canada to work for a year as a private Hebrew tutor for a local family. She met her future husband here.

"I do love Canada," Etigson said.

Her career at Associated, where she has taught Jewish studies in all grades from 1 through 8, has been "very rewarding." In 2002, she received a Teacher of Excellence award (a privately sponsored award recognizing Jewish day school teachers, which is no longer given).

As well, she said, she embraced "a North American life," and most of her friends here are Canadian.

One of the things that appeals to her about Modi'in is the mix of Israelis and North Americans. A friend of hers who made aliyah runs a paper there for "North American Anglo-Saxon artists," she said. "I can't wait to join the group."

Etigson said she won't miss Toronto's cold weather, but she will miss the fall colours and the beauty of freshly fallen snow.

Nature is a recurring theme in her art, as is Judaism. One piece was inspired by last year's Birkat Hachamah, the blessing of the sun, recited only at the end of a 28-year solar cycle. The paintings range in price from $150 to $500.

In part, Etigson's decision to retire from teaching was spurred by memories of her own grandmother. "I feel that my grandmother gave me so much in my life – so much love, so much warmth, so much thoughtfulness. I want to do that for my grandchildren."

She said her upcoming art show would be "a nice chance to see people, and say hello and goodbye."

The show will take place June 13 from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. at 163 Gailcrest Circle in Thornhill.

A middle way, or as ugly as it gets?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The May 17 Turkey-Brazil deal with Iran to enrich nuclear fuel that can be used only for civilian purposes has been interpreted in vastly different ways by journalists.

Perhaps none more so than in the case of two liberal journalists – the Globe and Mail's Doug Saunders and the New York Times' Thomas Friedman. This isn't simply a predictable matter of a difference of opinion between left and right – which makes the study of this contrast all the more interesting.

In his May 22 Globe and Mail column, "Brazil and Turkey rush to the middle," Saunders wrote that in reaching the deal with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for Tehran to ship "some" of its uranium to Turkey for enrichment, Brazilian President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva and Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan "managed to accomplish… exactly what the United States and its allies had failed to do last October."

(Well, not quite. The United States didn't fail as much as Iran delayed accepting the UN-sponsored deal and then imposed its own stipulations that rendered the plan invalid.)

In any event, Saunders took the position that Turkey and Brazil are assuming responsible, constructive roles in trying to defuse international tensions over Iran's nuclear policy. Playing on the term "middle" (apparently as in "even-handed"), he remarked:

"Brazil and Turkey became this week what Canada has long tried to be: successful middle powers. Ottawa has never really achieved this status, except maybe for a few years in the 1960s, because Canada has never really managed to be in the middle – less so today than ever. What we saw Monday was a genuine middle."

Here, on the other hand, is Friedman's take on the deal (in "As Ugly as It Gets," May 26):

"I confess that when I first saw the May 17 picture of Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, joining his Brazilian counterpart, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, and the Turkish prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, with raised arms – after their signing of a putative deal to defuse the crisis over Iran's nuclear weapons program – all I could think of was: Is there anything uglier than watching democrats sell out other democrats to a Holocaust-denying, vote-stealing Iranian thug just to tweak the U.S. and show that they, too, can play at the big power table?"

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva

Recep Tayyip Erdogan

In Saunders' account, Turkey and Brazil, far from trying to stick it to the Americans, are actually acting in the interests of the United States. "While some commentators described this [deal] as an act of rogue diplomacy by a headstrong Lula and Erdogan," Saunders wrote, "officials from the U.S. State Department told reporters in briefings that, in fact, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton had encouraged Turkey and Brazil to negotiate the deal."

One can only wonder who these officials are and whether they were in fact speaking for their boss, Clinton. After all, Matthew Lee of the Associated Press reported back on May 13 that Clinton had heated words with Turkey's foreign minister over its plans to aid Iran in its effort to thwart another round of UN sanctions (which, on May 18, the five permanent members of the Security Council agreed to discuss). Lee added that "[t]op Iranian officials [had] been courting Brazil, Turkey and other non-permanent Security Council members to pre-empt possible sanctions."

In Friedman's rendering, too, Turkey and Brazil (whose president is acting against democracies in Latin America), were only too pleased to side with Iran against the United States.

Whereas Saunders judged that, with their May 17 deal, Turkey and Brazil had found a reliable, peace-promoting solution to the problem posed by Iran's nuclear program, Friedman reached the opposite conclusion. He explained that the May 17 deal leaves Iran in possession of nearly half of its nuclear stockpile "which it still refuses to put under international inspection and is free to augment and continue to reprocess to the higher levels needed for a bomb."

In short, Turkey and Brazil have enabled Iran to continue to defy UN demand that it cease its nuclear enrichment program, and have played into Iran's determination to weaken the "global coalition" that the United States, Europe and others have been trying to put together on this matter.

Hardly, it would seem, the role of responsible "middle" powers.

Chassidic shul to fight contraband charges

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An Outremont synagogue intends to fight fines for illegal importation of alcohol imposed by Montreal Municipal Court.

The chassidic Skver community's Congregation Toldos Yakov Yosef on Durocher Avenue and 15 of its members have been ordered to pay fines of between $125 and $6,000.

Mayer Feig, a spokesperson for the Jewish Orthodox Community Council, which represents several chassidic communities, said that as a religious institution, the shul has the right under federal law to bring into Quebec alcohol that is for sacramental use.

In fact, he said this congregation and others have for years been buying alcohol in Ontario and transporting it to Montreal with the knowledge of the Société des alcools du Québec (SAQ).

"We have been paying duty to [the SAQ] every time. They invoiced us and took the taxes," Feig said. "We are not hiding anything. Everything has been done in broad daylight."

Over the years, the police have confiscated alcohol from synagogues that had been purchased outside the province, but each time they have released it, he said, including from the Skver congregation about 18 months ago.

"The federal law is very, very clear, and no Quebec law overrides it," Feig continued. "Legally, the municipal court has no standing – we have a lawyer's opinion on that."

He believes the municipal prosecutor has become tougher because of "pressure from external forces in Outremont." The chassidim are frequently the subject of complaints by area residents that they are violating municipal bylaws.

The Montreal police, however, say the congregation was warned several times since at least 2006 that importing alcohol was against the law. The civil charges were laid after an investigation by police, which resulted in the seizure in December of 891 litres of wine, spirits and liqueurs while it was being unloaded at the Skver synagogue.

That alcohol was purchased in Ontario and trucked into Quebec. Inter-provincial trade barriers forbid the direct delivery of any alcohol across provincial borders to any party not affiliated with or representing a province's liquor board, in this case, the SAQ, or an approved vendor.

Feig said the congregation will defend itself by citing an exemption in the federal Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act, which states: "Nothing in this act shall be deemed to forbid the importing, sending, taking or transporting, or causing to be imported, sent, taken or transported, into any province from or out of any place within or outside Canada or intoxicating liquor for sacramental or medicinal purposes."

While most of the hundreds of bottles seized were kosher wine, police said there were also beverages such as peach schnapps and banana liqueur.

According to earlier media reports, the alcohol was purchased from private vendors in Ontario. The Liquor Control Board of Ontario authorizes sacramental wine vendors who can sell products at a discount exclusively for use in religious ceremonies by clergy. They can import wine into Ontario, but not export it.

The SAQ doesn't authorize such vendors in Quebec, but recognized religious officials can buy alcohol at SAQ outlets at 17 per cent below the listed price.

'Nazi' soap sent to Ontario for testing

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal police have sent a bar of swastika-stamped soap that they seized in March from a shopkeeper to a lab in Ontario for analysis.

Insp. Paul Chablo, head of media relations, said the Montreal police lab isn't equipped to determine if the soap contains human remains, as shopkeeper Abraham Botines had led would-be purchasers to believe.

Chablo said results are expected some time this month. This lab will be conducting DNA tests at the mitochondrial level, which can distinguish between human and animal genetic material.

Chablo would not say if the lab is part of a police force or private.

The soap was confiscated after a complaint by B'nai Brith Canada.

Botines, who is Jewish, offered the bar for sale at his curiosity shop on St. Laurent Boulevard, which deals in other World War II memorabilia.

He told reporters that he got it from a Canadian veteran of that war who was told it was made from the fat of people who died in the Nazi camps.

While there have been persistent rumours since the war that the Nazis produced such soap, Israel's Holocaust authority, Yad Vashem, has denied it.

Congress lobbies for action on Darfur

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Fifteen representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress descended on Ottawa last week to lobby MPs to have Canada step up its role in easing the plight of refugees from the Darfur region of western Sudan.

They called on parliamentarians to provide additional resources to a UN humanitarian mission in Darfur, create a parliamentary committee that would focus on potential incidents of genocide and crimes against humanity and step up Canada's diplomatic involvement to the ambassadorial level at the Doha, Qatar, peace talks.

Congress' "Darfur action committee Ottawa lobby day" included educational sessions, brainstorming discussions and a briefing by Scott Proudfoot, Foreign Affairs' top public servant responsible for the Darfur file, said Ben Fine, a member of Congress' Darfur action committee.

There is some urgency in taking steps now to support Darfur refugees, Fine said. Darfur refugees remain virtual prisoners in displaced persons camps as rebel factions fight among themselves and against government-supported militias, creating a situation of lawlessness and danger outside the camps.

In addition, in January 2011 south Sudan will hold a referendum on independence, "and all signs are that they will secede from the north. The concern is that tensions between the north and the south will increase. There are two million dead in 20-plus years. Could that reignite?" he asked.

Though the conflict in the south is separate from the one in Darfur – that war in the south saw the Muslim north oppress and murder Christian and pagan residents – a break-up of the country could lead to "the Somalification of Sudan," Fine said.

Jewish leaders call on MPs to do more to help refugees in the area

Since 2003, when the conflict in Darfur began, Sudanese-government-backed Janjaweed militias have killed as many as 400,000 Darfurians and created two million refugees. Thousands of small farming villages have been destroyed in a campaign that has been described as ethnic cleansing and genocide.

While Canada has undertaken a variety of steps to support Darfurian refugees, more needs to be done, Fine said. In addition to increasing Canada's representation in Doha to an ambassador level, it should sponsor fact-finding missions to Darfur as a way of pressuring the government of Sudan; it should hold Sudan accountable for its commitment to peace, as negotiated with the south in 2005, and urge the Khartoum government to allow humanitarian agencies to operate unhindered and end attacks on civilians, and it should consider travel bans on Sudanese leaders and the freezing of assets if Sudan doesn't comply with its international obligations.

Fine said the creation of a parliamentary committee or sub-committee to prevent genocide would provide the infrastructure for parliamentarians to regularly monitor situations around the world that could lead to genocide and allow Parliament to proactively respond to imminent genocides.

Canada also can urge UN member states to contribute more resources to UNAMID, the African Union/UN hybrid operation in Darfur, such as transport units and a level two trauma hospital.

Conservative MP Tim Uppal said he agreed Canada could do more to help Darfurians. "What I took away from the meeting was that I would speak to my colleagues to see if we could set up a separate sub-committee on Darfur," he said.

Uppal said a presentation by Holocaust survivor Anna Heilman was memorable. "She really brings it into perspective, the humanity side of it," he said.

Liberal MP Glen Pearson was also moved by her talk. "She felt Darfur was similar to the Holocaust – that people are aware of it but not dealing with it."

Pearson said he didn't expect Parliament to act quickly to establish an official committee to deal with issues of genocide. Parliament has been too distracted by relatively trivial issues, and "there is no appetite from Parliament in general," and in particular the government, to create a new committee, he said.

He felt the atmosphere might change in the fall when MPs return from the summer break and when Sudan holds its referendum. That could push Darfur nearer the top of the foreign policy agenda, he suggested.

Fine said the situation in Darfur tugs at the hearts of many Congress members, who are only one or two generations removed from the Holocaust. He himself is the grandson of a survivor and he became concerned about the situation in western Sudan four years ago when he read about the "rapes and the ethnic dimensions" to the conflict.

"Darfur is a story which hits home in the Jewish community in Canada and across the world, the story of ethnic-motivated conflict leading to death and destruction of other communities simply because of who they are. That is something our community is aware of," he said. "This group did not want to stand by and do nothing."

Among the Jewish participants in the lobby day were Amichai Wise, chair of Congress' Darfur action committee, Benjamin Shinewald, Congress vice-president, Heilman, who survived the Warsaw Ghetto and Auschwitz, and Norman Epstein of CASTS (Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan).

They were joined by members of Stand Canada, a youth group, the Darfur-Sudan Peace Network and the SubSahara Centre.

Among the MPs participating were Liberals Glen Pearson, Anita Neville and Bob Rae; Conservatives Uppal, David Sweet and Brian Jean, as well as Senator Linda Frum, and Senator Consiglio Di Nino, and NDP MP Bill Siksay.

Montreal shuls' future to be examined

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTRAL — The problems many Montreal-area synagogues face due to declining membership and lack of effective leadership are being addressed by Federation CJA, which traditionally has had an arms-length relationship with religious institutions.

Representatives, including rabbis, lay people and staff, of 17 mainstream congregations accepted the federation's recent invitation to sit down together and discuss the challenges that face them.

Tools for Shuls is a multi-year project that will see the federation provide expertise to synagogues in such areas as governance, fundraising and getting people more actively involved.

Federation CJA to study declining membership, effective leadership

"We are offering a platform for co-operation during this time of transformation," said the initiative's chair, federation first vice-president David Cape, who is also president of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

As Beth Zion Congregation president Lawrence Rosenberg bluntly put it: "There are too many shuls and not enough Jews," particularly in Snowdon/Côte des Neiges and Côte St. Luc, and among mainstream Ashkenazi congregations.

"I think every shul [in these areas] is looking at a merger. Nobody likes to talk about it, but the synagogues are part of the community, and they have a responsibility to do what is good for the community," Rosenberg said.

They will have to either get their financial houses in order or look for a more drastic solution.

Federation executive director Andrés Spokoiny prefers to accentuate the positive. "This is a recognition that the synagogues are a very important constituent of the community, vital for Jewish continuity and education…" he said. "We are trying to help them think strategically about their future."

Cape would like to see the synagogues operating in a more business-like way. However, he underlined that the federation is not trying to impose or recommend solutions.

While some synagogues have been experiencing problems for years, even decades, the situation was brought into sharper focus by the economic downturn that began in 2008, he said.

Working with the synagogues is part of the federation's attempt to "renew Jewish life" in Montreal by strengthening the community's key institutions through its broad-based Gen J program and with funding from the Jewish Community Foundation. Similar co-operation is already underway with the Jewish day schools and camps.

At the first Tools for Shuls meeting, two American consultants, Rabbi Hayim Herring and Marsha Rothpan, who have advised synagogues elsewhere in North America, were brought in to speak. Rabbi Herring is the former executive director of STAR (Synagogues: Transformation and Renewal).

While Montreal has its distinct demographic characteristics, Cape believes its synagogues share a lot of the same issues as others on the continent. For one thing, synagogues have to learn how to "market" themselves if they want to attract people. They must also clearly define the roles of the rabbi, board and executive directors.

The federation invitation was issued through the interdenominational Synagogue Council of Greater Montreal, and congregations from Reform to Orthodox, Ashkenazi and Sephardi, took part.

The overwhelming majority of participants, in their evaluations, found the workshop useful and want to continue the process, Cape said. "I think the response validates that there is a need and a hunger for this kind of thing. The synagogues are eager to move forward. People have a sense of urgency and want to accomplish something."

Rosenberg applauded the federation's attempt to get the synagogues to address the issues. Now it is up to the congregations to do what is best for the community as a whole, he believes.

Beth Zion is an example of a troubled synagogue that was able to turn itself around.

A couple of years ago, it was in serious debt and merging with another Côte St. Luc congregation seemed inevitable. Today, the shul is in the black and in better financial shape than it has been in 20 or 25 years, said Rosenberg.

That is not due to a spike in membership, which stands today at around 550 families, down from a peak of about 1,000, or because of a sudden windfall, he said.

Rather, he credits the resurgence to the popularity of Rabbi Ira Ebbin, whom the shul hired three years ago, and a rigorous review of the synagogue's finances by the board.

They found there was room to make cuts, including in staff, and the congregation entered into a lucrative partnership with a caterer, who, as its tenant, operates the reception hall and paid for extensive renovations.

The hall is booked solid these days, Rosenberg said, generating steady revenue – enough to put on a new roof and install a new heating and cooling system in the more than 50-year-old building.

"We are operating more like a business, more efficient, more productive. We are spending every dollar carefully."

Rabbi Burak led Beth Jacob for 40 years

'Got along with everybody, whatever their level of observance'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Moses J. Burak, longtime spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth Jacob V'Anshei Dridz Congregation, and a former CJN columnist who wrote "Living Halacha" every week for many years, died May 16 at Israel's Tel Hashomer Hospital following a lengthy illness. He was 88.

He and his wife had been living in Bnei Brak, where their son-in-law Rabbi Tanchum Becker is the Ozarower Rebbe, since 2004.

A native of Skalat, Galicia (then Poland, and now part of Ukraine) who grew up in Toronto, Rabbi Burak was born to a chassidic family on March 2, 1922. They emigrated to Canada six years later, and his father worked as a melamed to make ends meet.

> 'He was a friendly man who was very intelligent bookwise and streetwise, and he had a great sense of humour'

"His father understood that his son was growing up in Canada, and wasn't going to impose on him the lifestyle of Poland, but the values – the yirat Shamayim (fear of Heaven), the Torah and the principles he stood for, and the warmth to Judaism – that, he put tremendous emphasis on," said Rabbi Yosef Ettlinger in a phone interview from Jerusalem, speaking on behalf of the family.

Rabbi Ettlinger, whose wife is Rabbi Burak's granddaughter, said that Rabbi Burak attended public schools – there were no Jewish day schools in Toronto when he was growing up – and he remembers him as a "very well-educated" and "very cultured" man who played both guitar and piano.

Rabbi Burak, who had a PhD in history, was ordained by Ner Israel Rabbinical College of Baltimore in 1942. He was also a graduate of McMaster University, the Ontario College of Education, the University of Richmond and the Dropsie College (now the Center for Advanced Judaic Studies at the University of Pennsylvania).

Rabbi Moses J. Burak

He served Toronto's Hebrew Men of England Synagogue and several congregations in the United States, and was chancellor of Toronto's Ner Israel Yeshiva College, as well as principal of Yeshivath Shlomei Emunei Israel before taking on the pulpit at Beth Jacob, where he served from 1962 to 2002.

His biography of the Hatam Sofer was published in 1967.

As well, from 1946 to 1950, Rabbi Burak was rabbi of Beth Jacob Congregation in Hamilton, Ont. The shul, which is now Conservative, was Orthodox at the time.

In a 1969 book by Marjorie Freeman Campbell marking the congregation's 80th anniversary, Rabbi Burak was described as "a very Orthodox rabbi, and a tall dark handsome man with a fine speaking voice."

Rabbi Moshe Stern of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation told The CJN that when he first came to Toronto 30 years ago, Rabbi Burak was his "shoulder to lean on.

"He was always there for me," recalled Rabbi Stern, who served on Toronto's Orthodox beit din with Rabbi Burak.

As well, he said, Rabbi Burak "got along with everybody, whatever their level of observance. He was a friendly man who was very intelligent bookwise and streetwise, and he had a great sense of humour."

Rabbi Ettlinger recalls Rabbi Burak as "a master at interpersonal relationships," and Moishe Lichtenstein, Beth Jacob V'Anshe Dridz's gabbai and a longtime shul member, added that Rabbi Burak was "a great orator, and very well liked by everyone."

Rabbi Burak leaves his wife Toby; daughters Faigie Becker of Bnei Brak, Libby Feiffer of Cleveland, Hindy Neumann of Baltimore, Helene Gruzd of Edenvale, South Africa, and Yitty Gold of Detroit; as well as many grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Founder of Jews for Jesus dies

By RABBI BENTZION KRAVITZ and JULIUS CISS
Special to The CJN

Opinion

Moishe Rosen, the notorious Jewish convert to Christianity who founded the infamous evangelical missionary group Jews for Jesus, died on May 19, 2010, in San Francisco, after a prolonged battle with cancer. He was 78. His passing presents a serious opportunity to reflect on the devastating effect he had on thousands of Jewish lives worldwide.

Born Martin Rosen in 1932 to immigrant Jewish parents, he was raised with a minimal Jewish education in Denver, Colo. He converted to Christianity in 1953, at the age of 21, and in 1957, he was ordained a Baptist minister.

From 1957 to 1972, he worked as a missionary for the American Board of Missions to the Jews (currently known as Chosen People Ministries). After a falling out, reportedly over his controversial proselytizing tactics, using the name "Moishe," Rosen launched the radical San Francisco-based Jews for Jesus movement in 1973.

He believed "Judaism never saved anybody" and that unless you believe in Jesus as your lord and saviour, you will burn in hell forever. To Rosen, this included the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

Rosen's Christian missionary philosophy personified three controversial New Testament passages: Romans 1:16 – "to the Jew first;" I Corinthians 9:20 – "to the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might win Jews;" and Philippians 1:18 – "whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is proclaimed; and in this I will rejoice."

He aggressively and almost exclusively targeted Jews for conversion, and is responsible for the loss of countless young Jews to the Christian faith and the subsequent damage done to thousands of Jewish families. His most successful and deceptive tactic promoted the notion that a Jew can be both Jewish and Christian at the same time. However, he simultaneously condemned Judaism as a "false religion" and once said, "The fact is, we are not practising any form of Judaism. We are practising Christianity." This didn't stop him from encouraging the use of rabbinic Jewish practices, such as lighting Shabbat candles or wearing a kippah in an attempt to masquerade Christianity in the guise of authentic Judaism.

Sadly, as a direct result of Rosen's pioneering efforts, today there are more than 1,000 Christian missionary groups targeting Jews for conversion worldwide, using evangelical technology that he initiated. With an annual budget exceeding $275 million, these groups have succeeded in converting hundreds of thousands of Jews globally in recent decades. The American Religious Identification Survey 2008 estimated that 500,000 American Jews had converted to a religion other than Judaism, the most dominant faith being Christianity.

Rabbi Bentzion Kravitz is the founder and executive director of Jews for Judaism International, based in Los Angeles, and Julius Ciss is the founder and executive Director of Jews for Judaism (Canada), based in Toronto.

Dalhousie to create chair in Jewish studies

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — A chair in Jewish studies at Dalhousie University is being established with the support of Jim Spatz in honour of his parents, Simon and Riva, who survived World War II as freedom fighters in Poland.

Once fully funded, the endowed chair will be part of the university's religious studies program within the department of classics and the faculty of arts and social sciences. The campaign goal is $3 million, of which about one-third has already been collected, either through direct donations or pledges, Dalhousie officials said.

Jim Spatz

Jim Spatz, chair of Dalhousie's board of governors, made what he calls a "substantial contribution to start the program. It feels great to be able to do that. I feel privileged to be able help establish the chair and to honour my parents."

Chris Steeves, the development officer for Dalhousie's faculty of management who was initially involved with the Spatz donation as development officer of the school of arts and sciences, added: "The endowment will produce $150,000 in annual income to provide a salary and other costs. We hope to have the faculty person in the Spatz Chair by July 2011," he said. "The chair in Jewish studies was a faculty-driven project… and we provided help getting it going."

Jim Spatz said it was the university's idea to create the chair. "As board chair, I heard about it and knew I wanted to support it. It was a great fit for me, personally, with my Jewish background."

The number of Jewish students at Dalhousie has blossomed to more than 600, a large percentage of whom hail from Ontario, in the last half dozen years. Through the years, Dalhousie has had, or has, a Jewish president (currently Tom Traves), chancellor (Richard Goldbloom filled that role), members of the board of governors (currently Jim Spatz) and much more representation from the local community.

"Jim's gift took the chair from the visionary to the reality stage," said Ronald Mitton of the development office. "From there, we have approached his friends, colleagues and others in the community, in Halifax and from afar, to support the program. The response has been excellent."

Jim Spatz, a Dalhousie medical graduate, heads a major housing and commercial development company in the Halifax area that was started by his father soon after he, Riva and their infant son, Jim, emigrated in 1950. He retired from medical practice in 1988 when he joined the company.

Simon Spatz, who lost most of his family in the Holocaust, was interned at a labour camp and fled to the forest with his younger brother just a day before the camp was liquidated and all its occupants murdered. Riva belonged to a partisan group in the Jewish resistance movement and lived out the war in the woods of Poland.

"When you see what my parents went through, it makes you more tolerant. The freedom and opportunity represented by Canada makes you want to give back," Jim Spatz said. "They didn't go to university but my sister and I both went to Dal. It's a good story for me to be able to do this."

The Simon and Riva Spatz Chair in Jewish Studies will have three areas of focus: teaching, research and outreach. The chair is envisioned to help students appreciate how centuries-old beliefs influence contemporary world events.

Current course offerings related to Jewish studies include Hebrew, Aramaic, Judaism, the history of ancient Israel, and Jewish philosophies and theologians.

The Spatz chair will support an intellectual community by exploring interconnected religious traditions and come to understand how they play out in contemporary society.

A significant portion of the chair's efforts will focus on teaching and program development. The research goal will be to expand the knowledge of Judaism at the university and complement the current work in the faculty of arts and sciences. Sharing knowledge and findings will be the goal of the outreach program.

"Potential donors strongly recommended making the program relevant to today and what's happening on the world front, as much as history," Steeves said. "We expect the chair will expand the outreach portion of the program by bringing in speakers and authors, and engaging the entire local community."

Jim Spatz agreed. "The existence of a chair in Jewish studies will hopefully foster one in Islamic studies in the future. A university is there for people to exchange ideas, not always friendly, but the ability to do that is at the heart of what a university does."

Simon, who died in 2007, received an honorary degree from Saint Mary's University in 2002 and, with Jim, was inducted into the Nova Scotia Business Hall of Fame in June 2007. Both Simon and Riva, who still lives in the family home, were active volunteers in the Jewish community.

IDF commandos say flotilla crew tried to lynch them

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said Monday that the organizers of the Gaza aid flotilla were to blame after at least 10 activists were killed when Israeli navy commandos stormed their ship.

In a press conference hours after the incident, Barak said Israel was prepared to accept the consequences of its actions and would continue to protect its autonomy.

Barak voiced regret for the deaths, but called the flotilla a political provocation and said the sponsors of the flotilla were violent supporters of a terror organization.

Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi, meanwhile, said the soldiers were forced by violent activists to respond with live fire.

Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon said earlier Monday that the organizers of the Gaza aid flotilla have connections to international terrorist organizations such as Hamas and Al Qaeda, and called the aid convoy a violent and provocative attempt to break the blockade on Gaza.

Ayalon, speaking at a press conference at the Foreign Ministry, said Israel found weapons aboard the Gaza flotilla, which were used against IDF troops.

The deputy foreign minister said the Gaza flotilla didn't heed Israel's calls to halt its movement toward Gaza on Monday morning, and he stressed that no sovereign country would have allowed such a provocation to take place.

"We couldn't allow the opening of a corridor of smuggling arms and terrorists," said Ayalon.

The deputy foreign minister told reporters that Israel doesn't want to fight with any country, but the incident on the Gaza flotilla is not yet over.

The left-wing activists on board a flotilla carrying aid to the Gaza Strip tried to lynch the Israel Navy commandos who stormed their Turkish-flagged ship early Monday, IDF sources told Ha'aretz.

The commandos, who intercepted the Turkish ferry Mavi Marmara after it ignored orders to turn back, said they encountered violent resistance from activists armed with sticks and knives. According to the soldiers, the activists threw one of their comrades from the upper deck to the lower one after they boarded.

Activists attacked a commando with iron bars as he descended onto the ship from a helicopter, the army said. The IDF said its rules of engagement allowed troops to open fire in what it called a "life-threatening situation."

The soldiers said they were forced to open fire after the activists struck one of their comrades in the head and trampled on him. A senior field commander ordered the soldiers then to respond with fire, a decision which the commandos said received full backing from the military command.

At least 10 people were killed and several more wounded after Israeli naval troops opened fire on the six-ship flotilla. Unofficial reports put the death toll at between 14 and 20.

"Our initial findings show that at least 10 convoy participants were killed," an army spokesperson said.

The military said in a statement: "Navy fighters took control of six ships that tried to violate the naval blockade [of Gaza]... During the takeover, the soldiers encountered serious physical violence by the protesters, who attacked them with live fire."

Turkey's NTV said more than 60 people were also wounded after IDF vessels stormed the flotilla in international waters.

The IDF earlier confirmed that two navy commandos had been wounded in the fight, which apparently broke out after activists tried to seize their weapons.

Elite troops from Shayetet 13, a naval commando unit, boarded the protest boats at around 4 A.M. Earlier Monday, Al Jazeera reported that the Gaza aid flotilla had changed course to avoid a confrontation with Israeli warships.

The Israeli naval vessels reportedly made contact earlier with the six-ship flotilla, which is carrying 10,000 tons of humanitarian aid and supplies to Gaza.

Israel had said it would let the aid, but not the flotilla, reach the strip.

Netanyahu leaves Canada early, cancels Washington trip

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

OTTAWA — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu cut short his two-day visit to Canada on Monday and cancelled his subsequent visit to Washington, D.C., to return to Israel after 10 international activists were killed when Israeli Navy commandos stormed a ship bringing aid to the Gaza Strip.

Netanyahu met Monday with Prime Minister Stephen Harper, but he called off a planned joint press conference and an appearance at a gala dinner hosted by Harper Monday evening, Canadian Press reported.

Netanyahu was to have met Tuesday with U.S. President Barack Obama at the White House.

In a statement Monday morning, Harper's communications director, Dimitri Soudas, said that "Canada deeply regrets the loss of life and the injuries suffered" in the raid and is "currently looking for more information in order to shed light on exactly what happened."

Also on Monday, Turkey announced that it was recalling its ambassador to Israel, while Egypt summoned Israel's envoy in Cairo in response to the incident. Egypt in 1979 became the first Arab state to sign a peace treaty with Israel. Turkey and Israel have diplomatic ties, although they have been strained over the last year.

The Arab League, meanwhile, urged member states to "reconsider" their dealings with Israel. Syria asked for an emergency Arab League meeting to discuss what it described as Israeli aggression on Gaza-bound international aid ships.

"Syria's representative to the Arab League has submitted a formal memo to the league requesting it to convene," the official Syrian news agency said.

"Israel's attack indicates Israel is not ready for peace. Israel attacked the liberty fleet because it feels it is above the law," Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa said in Doha.

"There is no benefit in dealing with Israel in this manner, and we must re-assess our dealing with Israel," he said.

Israel's foreign ministry warned its citizens to avoid travel to Turkey and instructed those already there to keep a low profile and avoid crowded downtown areas.

Turkey denounced Israel's killing as "unacceptable" and summoned Israel's ambassador to discuss the incident, bringing already tense relations between the countries to new heights.

The ministry said Israel had violated international law and must now face the consequences. "[The interception on the convoy] is unacceptable… Israel will have to endure the consequences of this behaviour," it said in a statement.

Murat Mercan, a lawmaker from Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's ruling party, said: "I was expecting an intervention. I was not expecting bloodshed, the use of arms and bullets."

"Israel is engaged in activity that will extremely hurt its image," he said. Erdogan, meanwhile, cut short a trip abroad to deal with the incident.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas described the clashes as a "massacre."

The White House on Monday said it "deeply regretted" the loss of life and injuries sustained in the clashes.

"The United States deeply regrets the loss of life and injuries sustained, and is currently working to understand the circumstances surrounding this tragedy," said White House spokesperson William Burton.

United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon called for a full investigation and expressed shock at Israel's storming of the flotilla.

"It is vital that there is a full investigation to determine exactly how this bloodshed took place. I believe Israel must urgently provide a full explanation," he said at a press conference in the Ugandan capital of Kampala.

France became the first European nation to respond to the early-morning events. Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner said he was "profoundly shocked."

Many of the activists aboard the protest ships were European nationals, and analysts have predicted a harsh diplomatic response from the European Union and its member states.

The European Union demanded an inquiry, and Germany said it was "shocked." The United Nations condemned violence against civilians in international waters.

Germany, one of Israel's most loyal allies, questioned whether the action by Israeli commandos was proportionate.

Two members of the Bundestag lower house of parliament were among five Germans on board the ships, the foreign ministry said.

"The German government is shocked by events in the international waters by Gaza," government spokesperson Ulrich Wilhelm told a regular news conference, adding the government was seeking further clarification about the incident.

"Every German government supports unconditionally Israel's right to self-defence," said Wilhelm. But he added that Israeli actions should correspond to what he described as the "basic principle" of proportionality.

"A first look does not speak in favour of this basic principle being adhered to," he said. Berlin would await further details before judging the incident, he added.

Italy also condemned the killing of civilians during Israel's storming of the aid flotilla as "very grave" and asked for an EU investigation to ascertain the facts. "I deplore in the strongest terms the killing of civilians. This is certainly a grave act," said Foreign Minister Franco Frattini.

Referring to the European Commission, he said it was "indispensable that there be an inquest to ascertain the facts, which are still not clear."

He also said he had asked the Israeli ambassador for clarification and hoped that it would not hurt efforts on the part of Israel and Turkey to co-operate in the search for Middle East peace.

Torah scrolls stolen from Antwerp synagogue

JTA

ANTWERP — Several Torah scrolls have been stolen from Antwerp's main synagogue, in what may be the largest such theft ever reported in Belgium.

Congregation members arrived for morning services on Saturday to find that between four and six Torah scrolls had been taken from the synagogue on Oostenstraat overnight Friday – including one that is more than 200 years old and was hidden by a Jewish woman held in a Nazi concentration camp during World War II.

Community leaders suspect that whoever stole the Torah scrolls had inside information as to how to reach the Ark through a hallway door into the sanctuary.

Pinchas Kornfeld, head of the city's Jewish community, told Ynet that "the last people to leave the synagogue closed the seminary, and the first ones to arrive in the morning noticed that the Holy Ark had been broken into."

According to the Belgian Jewish newspaper, Joods Aktueel, police have investigated the scene and are seeking possible images captured on video surveillance cameras in the area.

Experts have suggested that the thieves are more likely to demand a ransom for the Torah scrolls than to try to sell them. Buyers always want to know the origin of a scroll, and these Torah scrolls are easily identifiable, Joods Aktueel reported.

During World War II, 10 Torah scrolls and hundreds of prayer books were thrown out of the synagogue onto the street and burned.

Israel Briefs

Flotilla shuns Schalit

Pro-Palestinian activists on a convoy of ships planning to dock in Gaza port refused to bring a letter to Gilad Schalit from his family. The Freedom Flotilla, organized by the Free Gaza group, left from ports in Ireland, Greece and Turkey last week and is scheduled to arrive this Thursday off the coast of Gaza. Noam Schalit, father of the Israeli soldier who has been held captive in Gaza for four years, asked leaders of the flotilla to take the letter and a package to Hamas to give to his son, offering in exchange to try to convince the Israeli government to allow the convoy to land in Gaza. Israel decided that its navy would prevent the convoy from reaching Gaza, including by using force, and would deport the hundreds of activists aboard to their countries of origin. The humanitarian aid on board the ships, including food, clothing and construction materials, will be transferred to Gaza, however.

Gaza attack foiled

Israeli troops prevented three Palestinians from carrying out a terror attack near the border with Gaza. At least seven Palestinians reportedly were wounded last Thursday evening when Israel's air force fired at three Palestinians planting explosives near the fence, close to Kibbutz Nahal Oz, Ynet reported. The Palestinians reportedly were taking advantage of heavy fog to carry out their mission. Following the foiling of the attack, several mortar shells were fired from Gaza at the area.

Joint paramedic training

Jordanian and Israeli paramedic students are training together for the first time. Fifteen Jordanian students spent the past academic year at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev in Be'er Sheva as part of the Israeli-Jordanian Academic Emergency Medicine Collaboration. The three-year program, taught in English and Arabic, will allow Jordanian paramedics to obtain the same high level of emergency medical training as their Israeli counterparts, allowing them to respond more effectively to crises and natural disasters. Israel's Magen David Adom and Jordan's Red Crescent, as well as both governments, have sanctioned the program. In a region where collaboration with Israel is often shunned, project organizers noted the co-operation characterizing the program, the result of more than a decade of negotiations.

Minister's indictment urged

Israeli police have recommended that the state prosecutor indict Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman on charges of breach of trust for allegedly receiving classified information from an ongoing investigation against him for fraud and embezzlement. The recommendation carries no legal weight. Lieberman is suspected of laundering millions of shekels through various straw companies while serving as a public official and of obstructing the investigation into the money laundering charges. He denies wrongdoing.

New Zealand bans shchitah

By DAN GOLDBERG
JTA

SYDNEY, Australia – New Zealand has banned shchitah, the kosher slaughter of animals.

The country's new animal welfare code, which took effect May 28, mandates that all animals for commercial consumption be stunned prior to slaughter to ensure they are treated "humanely and in accordance with good practice and scientific knowledge."

The regulation has shocked the Jewish community.

"This decision by the New Zealand government, one which has a Jewish prime minister, is outrageous," said Rabbi Moshe Gutnick, acting president of the Organization of Rabbis of Australasia. "We will be doing everything possible to get this decision reversed."

Gutnick, who travels frequently to New Zealand to oversee shchitah, added, "One of the last countries I would have expected to bring in this blatantly discriminatory action would have been New Zealand."

David Zwartz, chairman of the Wellington Jewish Council, agreed. "I am sure there will objections made that this action is an infringement of the right of Jews to observe their religion," he said.

Agriculture Minister David Carter rejected a recommendation that shchitah be exempt from the new code.

The National Animal Welfare Advisory Committee did recommend a dispensation for kosher slaughter in 2001, but the new code doesn't allow any exemptions.

Among other countries that have banned shchitah are Iceland, Norway and Sweden.

KENT RECALLS AMIA BOMBING

Thornhill MP Peter Kent, minister of state for foreign affairs (Americas); Delegación de Asociaciones Israelitas Argentina president Aldo Donzis; Canadian Ambassador to Argentina Tim Martin, and Asociación Mutual Israelita Argentina President Guillermo Borger laid a wreath last week in memory of the victims of the 1994 AMIA Jewish community centre bombing in Buenos Aires. "Anti-Semitism is an evil so profound that it can strike at the heart of even the most cosmopolitan of societies," Kent said on his visit to the rebuilt centre. Eighty-five people were killed and more than 300 injured in the attack, whose perpetrators, believed to be from Hezbollah and Iran, remain at large. Kent was in Argentina for its bicentennial celebrations.

McGuinty's mission drums up new business

By JENNY HAZAN
Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — The David Intercontinental Hotel in Tel Aviv was abuzz with activity last week as representatives of Ontario and Israeli life science business took part in the first-ever Ontario trade mission to Israel and the West Bank.

Conversations between delegates were taking place in the lobby, along every hallway and around every corner.

"Governments can provide a framework, but the real work has to be done by you, the Canadian and Israeli businesspeople. I know that once you have gotten to know each other we are going to have a variety of joint ventures, cooperation and collaborations that are going to take our two countries to the next level," Canadian Ambassador to Israel John Allen said at the opening plenary session May 25.

His prediction kicked off four intense days of talks between members of the life science industry, with the mission's final two days being spent in Bethlehem, Ramallah and Beirut.

From May 23 to 27, the mission's leader, Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty, travelled throughout Israel, from the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa to Tel Aviv University and Shai Agassi's Better Place in Tel Aviv, to the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, to the Arava Institute and Aora Solar Thermal Test Site in Eilat.

Along the way, he met with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Shimon Peres and hit major tourist sites, including the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum and the Old City of Jerusalem.

On May 27, he also met with Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad in Ramallah to discuss ways to increase trade between Ontario and the West Bank.

All the while, 40 Ontario delegates, representing 32 life science organizations, got down to business with their Israeli counterparts.

Between networking events, expert panels, and workshops on the Canadian and Israeli markets and their respective business investment laws, tax incentives, venture capital industries and start-up trends, a number of deals were made and memorandums of understanding signed.

By the end of the mission's third day, agreements were signed between Toronto firms Axela Inc. and Kangaroo Design and Innovation and Israeli joint venture partners on next-generation instrument development. Axela also signed a letter of intent with the Israeli Ministry of Health for the use and distribution of Axela's breast cancer test.

Claron Technology of Toronto and BrainsGate of Caesarea signed an agreement to develop a system allowing experts at a central location to assist surgeons performing procedures at remote locations, and Profound Medical Inc. of Toronto and Nanomotion in Yokneam signed a deal to advance innovation and commercialization for image-guided, minimally invasive medical devices.

Queen's University's Parteq Innovations and Mosaic Crystals Ltd. (of Herzliya Pituach) signed an agreement to further their research collaboration, while York University and Hebrew University reached a deal to continue developing programs in areas of mutual academic interest.

Finally, Teva Pharmaceuticals agreed to invest $56 million (US) to expand its Stouffville, Ont., production plant, and the province of Ontario gave a $6.5-million grant to Teva Canada, which will retain 182 high-skilled workers and hire 20 new employees.

"We're here in Israel to show how we can improve lives with new partnerships in the life sciences," McGuinty said. He's the first Ontario premier to visit Israel since Conservative Mike Harris came in October 1998.

McGuinty initiated the mission with help from the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce (CICC), the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce (ICCC), the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF), and Israel's Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labour.

Along with the Ontario life science delegates, the mission was attended by Ontario Minister of Economic Development and Trade Sandra Pupatello, CICC president David Rubin, ICCC president Alan Baker, Israeli Chief Scientist Dr. Eli Opper, Canadian philanthropist and founder of Novopharm Leslie Dan, and Toronto-area Liberal MPPs Monte Kwinter, Eric Hoskins, David Zimmer and Mike Colle.

The mission is the culmination of 3-1/2 years of co-operation between Canada and Israel in the field of life sciences. Since 2006, 12 federal ministers have visited the Jewish state, as have two large provincial delegations.

In addition 10 Canadian university presidents have come to learn how Israeli institutions of higher learning commercialize their research, and in 2005, Ontario's Ministry of Research and Innovation signed an agreement with Israel's Ministry of Industry and Labor to collaborate on scientific and technological research and development via the CIIRDF.

Co-operation with Israel was furthered by Ontario's recent adoption of the five-year "Open Ontario" economic plan, which aims to increase trade between Israel and Ontario from its current value of $1.1 billion.

What brought the premier to Israel?

TEL AVIV — Last week's trip to Israel by Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty and a delegation of MPPs and Ontario life sciences sector representatives – the premier's first visit to Israel – left many asking why international co-operation with Israel has become such a priority for Ontario.

The premier offered some answers.

"Israel punches well above its weight in the world economy," McGuinty said while touring the country last week. "Israel produces more scientific papers per capita in the world, has the highest number of PhDs per capita in the world, the highest number of physicians per capita, and is first in the world for R&D investment as a percentage of GDP. Now that is one solid record of achievement."

Canadian-born Alan Feld, managing partner at Vintage Investment Partners in Herzliya Pituach, who spoke at an Ontario-Israel business session at the David Intercontinental Hotel on the Israeli venture capital market, added a few more reasons.

According to Feld, 43 of the 50 largest high tech companies in the world have R&D centres in Israel, and life sciences take the greatest percentage of venture capital funds. In 2009, 24 per cent of Israeli venture capital investment went to the sector, along with 34 per cent of non-domestic venture capital investment. Israel is also the No. 1 producer of medical device patents in the world.

The Israeli government has also put in place several incentives for international co-operation in the life sciences field, including a capital-matching program for later-stage firms, and significant tax incentives for foreign partners under the Law of Encouragement of Capital Investment.

McGuinty added one more reason: Israel's expertise in commercialization. This is a major area of priority for the province, whose Ministry of Research and Innovation recently launched a $161-million life sciences commercialization strategy.

"As Martin Luther King once said, Israel is one of the great outposts of democracy in the world and a marvelous example of what can be done," McGuinty said. "One of the ways that Israel acts upon those values is through a commitment to curing disease, and building a stronger economy at the same time.

"In Israel and in Ontario, we both understand that investing in scientific research is not enough. We also have to support the evolution of that new knowledge into new products, new services, new jobs and new economic growth," he said, adding: "Here in Israel, the Technion and the Weizmann Institute are places known both for breakthroughs in science and for their enlightened approach to discovery, innovation and commercialization."

"Israeli companies tend to be focused on the U.S. market, but there is a lot of opportunity to create a deeper connection between Ontario and Israel-based companies and universities," said Feld, who immigrated to Israel from Toronto.

Besides the practical connections between their respective life science industries, McGuinty sees other significant connections between Israel and Ontario.

"Life sciences are a priority that we share in Ontario, but it is not the only similarity," he said.

"We need to invest in our people. We need to enhance their knowledge, develop their skills and nurture their creativity," continued McGuinty, noting that this conclusion has produced in Israel the highest rate of university degrees per capita in the world, and in Ontario one of the highest rates of post-secondary education and the most highly educated workforce in North America.

According to McGuinty, the analogous Israeli-Ontarian pursuit of the life sciences is not only reflective of a mutual desire to generate revenues, it's also indicative of a shared moral purpose.

Premier Dalton McGuinty at the Western Wall

"This adventure in life sciences has a moral purpose. It's not just a matter of generating wealth or creating jobs. It's a matter of curing people, and surely that is a sweet spot for us as a people," he said. "Each of the delegates who have joined us share compassion for improving lives.

"Israel and Ontario do well in the life sciences on their own," McGuinty said. "But we could do even better working together.

"Together we could create even more good jobs for our people and help cure even more illness around the world. I am sure that each of us, Israel and Ontario, can continue to do well on our own. But I also know for sure that we can do even better together. Ontario and Israel. Israel and Ontario. Smart together. Strong together. Let's come together. Let's lift each other up. Together let's reach higher than we ever have before."

Palliative care doctor honoured by Paul Penna

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Larry Librach, director of the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care at Mount Sinai Hospital, is being honoured by Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School at its annual gala, to be held June 7 at the Miles Nadal JCC.

Librach, 64, is president of the Canadian Hospice and Palliative Care Association and director of the division of palliative care in the department of family and community medicine at the University of Toronto.

He was the physician leader of the national Educating Future Physicians for Palliative and End-of-Life Care Project (EFPPEC), which introduced curriculum in palliative and end-of-life care to Canada's 17 medical schools.

Librach, who has two grandchildren at Paul Penna, said that being recognized by the school is a tremendous honour.

"I've gotten other awards, but this is at the top. To be recognized by the community is great. When they approached me, I was speechless for the first time."

He said that when he was a young family physician at Toronto Western Hospital in the 1970s, he witnessed patients dying in pain. "We didn't know what to do for them. I [remember clearly] one patient who died in agony before my eyes."

His "world changed" he said, when he heard a talk by Dr. Balfour Mount, recognized as the person who brought palliative care to Canada.

"When I heard him speak, the clouds parted, and the sun shone down. He started me on my career [in palliative care.] I formed a palliative care team at Toronto Western Hospital" – he moved to Mount Sinai in 1989 – "and I am dedicated to helping dying patients, and their families."

Working in palliative care is spiritually uplifting, Librach said.

"When I'm with people who are reaching for purpose and meaning, it gives my life meaning. I've learned that my life cannot be all about work. I have to have time for my family, my friends, and for nature. [My career choice] has given me balance in my life."

At the end of their lives, he said, people are up front about most things, "and many tell me about their regrets. Palliative care is not just about managing pain. We help grieving families, and we listen to patients."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Naomi Tessler, 27, uses theatre to build confidence, literacy and communication skills.

Actor empowers students through theatre

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Naomi Tessler was always a shy kid, the one hiding behind her older sister.

Then she starred in her kindergarten play. And everything changed.

"I was Snow White," Tessler said. "It truly brought me out of myself. I became very outgoing after that performance. I found my voice through theatre. Through being able to speak to an audience. I realized I can do this all the time."

And she does.

Tessler, 27, holds drama workshops through Branch Out Theatre, a therapeutic theatre company. The actor, who likes to call herself a drama facilitator rather than teacher, uses acting as a way to improve literacy, build confidence, expand communication skills and teach conflict resolution.

Tessler, who has a master's degree in educational theatre, works with all age groups and demographics, from children to seniors.

"I customize workshops based on the needs of my clients... I've worked... with children as young as four to six and also worked with seniors and teenagers and adults," she said. "Theatre is the tool I use to motivate self-expression, creativity and self awareness."

For Tessler, drama is about more than memorizing scripts and enunciating. It's a release.

"I often find that people who come to the workshops, they may speak to you beforehand and say, 'I'm a little bit shy, a little bit hesitant.' When given their chance to express themselves, they use the biggest movements," she said. "[Theatre] is really an invitation to express themselves with creativity. I find many people... are waiting to be invited to use their creativity more."

While Tessler originally studied English literature in university, she also took drama courses at the University of British Columbia and performed in a school play every year. This was partly a result of her summers as a teenager, when she started getting leading roles in her camp's plays.

"I guess summertime for me was where I started getting bigger roles in musicals," she said, adding that she also joined her high school's drama club.

In the summer of 2008, Tessler started seeing theatre in a different light. That summer, she spent two weeks in Brazil participating in a workshop led by her mentor, Augusto Boal. Boal founded Theatre of the Oppressed, which encourages social change through drama.

"Basically it's a different style of theatre. It gives different populations a chance to voice their communities' experience through theatre," Tessler said, adding that Boal facilitated drama workshops in prisons and mental institutions.

These workshops involve creating a piece of theatre based on community issues. The piece is performed twice, and the audience is invited to come onstage and try to change the plot the second time.

"It basically gives people a chance to empower themselves and their communities, and find ways to work through the oppression they personally are facing," she said.

Tessler uses this style in her workshops, which also include theatre games, improvisation and physical theatre.

While she works in Toronto, the actor has taken her work around the world, including to India and Japan.

In India, she worked with a woman's group as well as an AIDS group, where she used theatre as a way to open up a dialogue about the disease.

"Everyone I met in the group weren't able to share with their family that they had AIDS. They had no support other than the group. The workshop was all about expressing [themselves]," she said, adding that theatre is ideal for this.

"Theatre offers that rehearsal space, that chance for practising. When you put things in the world in theatre, you're stepping outside yourself. You're giving yourself a chance to step into... someone else's shoes."

In Japan, Tessler's experience was a bit of a fluke. She had been teaching English in Japan when she stumbled into a centre for mentally challenged adults while sight-seeing.

"I thought it was an art gallery. It is, it showcased all art by participants. I walked in and asked if I could volunteer in my broken Japanese. Reluctantly, they agreed," she said, explaining that she facilitated theatrical workshops there for three or four months.

For Tessler, her workshops are about the journey.

"I love seeing people's journey through that shy character to someone who's completely outgoing," she said. "To get them to that state of empowerment... it makes me feel really grateful."

Apart from facilitating workshops, Tessler also acts. She recently finished performing in Teenage Depression, a two-woman show produced by Back Burner Productions.

The show, a dark comedy, centres on a teenager who calls into a suicide hotline, where Tessler's character, who hasn't quite finished her training, answers.

"I have no idea what to say. Throughout the course of the play, my friend commits suicide. You see my character go through a humorous... role to a [darker] role," she said.

For Tessler, it's difficult to transition from her role to her everyday life.

"I really tune into the emotions of the character... It was a challenge to get to that space of tragedy and to get out of it," she said.

For more information about Tessler and her workshops, visit www.branchouttheatre.com.

Naomi Tessler, left, runs workshops that include theatre games, physical theatre and improvisation.

Tessler, who runs drama workshops with Branch Out Theatre, has worked worldwide, including in India and Japan.

Marathon bike trips promote environmental awareness

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Three weeks ago, a group of weary but joyful cyclists rolled into Cape Town, South Africa, having finished one of the longest, most gruelling, trans-continental bike races in the world, the Tour d'Afrique.

Call it, if you wish, the ultimate bike ride.

Almost 12,000 kilometres in length, the four-month race took some of the riders from the pyramids of Egypt and the deserts of Sudan to the mud huts of Tanzania and the verdant hills of South Africa.

Fifty-seven cyclists, all over the age of 18, joined the tour for its entire length, while 42 completed various sections.

On a typical day, a cyclist could pedal as little as 60 kilometres or as much as 200 kilometres. The daily average was 125 kilometres.

Henry Gold, a 58-year-old Toronto businessman and cyclist extraordinaire who founded the Tour d'Afrique in 2002, supervised the race, with the assistance of his staff.

For the past few years, Gold – the owner of Tour d'Afrique Ltd., a private company in Toronto's Chinatown that plans and runs the race – has spent several weeks in Africa overseeing it.

In previous years, however, his duties would normally keep him away from home for longer periods. "It would depend on geopolitical or weather-related issues we faced," he said in an interview before this year's race ended.

A former Montrealer born in what is now Slovakia but was once Czechoslovakia, Gold founded the Tour d'Afrique because he loves Africa.

"I wanted to bring people to Africa to see it in a different way," he explained. "I happen to think that Africa is the most alluring and challenging continent."

The idea for the Tour d'Afrique came to him while he was working in Africa in the 1980s and 1990s as co-founder and executive director of Canadian Physicians for Aid and Relief, a non-governmental organization. He dreamed up ideas, secured funding and implemented projects.

After leaving Canadian Physicians for Aid and Relief, he became a consultant on environmental and transportation issues and co-founded the Committee for Public Transportation, a non-governmental organization focusing on transport, the environment and health.

He also co-produced a trilogy of documentaries, which were broadcast on Canadian and American television networks: Burden on the Land, which focused on foreign aid and development in Africa, AIDS in Africa, which covered the spread of that debilitating illness, and Meeting the Challenge, which examined health issues in Africa.

By his reckoning, most travellers experience Africa through the prism of its appalling poverty or the medium of a safari in exquisite countryside.

"I wanted to do something that would benefit Africa directly or indirectly. And I wanted to do something that was fun and adventurous."

On the Tour d'Afrique, riders are encouraged to raise funds for their favourite charities. Gold's Tour d'Afrique Foundation gives away bicycles and bike ambulances to health-care professionals throughout Africa.

In addition, Gold wants to raise awareness of the damage being done to the environment by motorized transportation.

"Dangerous levels of CO2 in the atmosphere due to the use of cars play a big role in the global warming crisis. We need to restrain the growth and use of the car. Neither urban infrastructure nor the environment can sustain such dangerous levels of growth."

He does not regard the tour as an endurance test, but hardy participants can stretch themselves over longer distances. The tour accommodates three categories of cyclists – racers who ride the entire route, expedition riders who cover a daily distance at their own pace, and sectional riders who ride a section or sections.

Whatever category they fall into, all participants have access to support vehicles in case they feel sick or are not fit enough.

The challenges they face can be daunting, Gold admits.

Aside from knowingly removing themselves from their "comfort zones," cyclists must use squat or bush toilets and learn to live without showers or baths. They must also put up with scorching heat and stone- throwing children.

To Gold, who has crossed four continents on a bike, reckless drivers who drive too fast and are too easily distracted pose the biggest danger.

On balance, the risks seem tolerable, even though some cyclists are injured in falls. "It's a real adventure," Gold noted, adding that the tour challenges riders physically and mentally.

Certainly, riders come away from it with indelible memories. "Last year, the founder of Lonely Planet guidebooks participated, and he's been talking about it ever since."

Leah McLaren, a Globe and Mail journalist, was impressed as well.

As she put it in a recent piece: "The Tour d'Afrique is frightening, and not because it involves bare-bones travel and bush camping across some of the most remote, impoverished and historically unstable countries in the world. The TDA is frightening because the entire length of this fascinating, gorgeous and confounding continent is traversed over 4-1/2 months on the back of a two-wheeled, pedal-powered contraption known as a bicycle."

Although he does not describe himself as an ardent cyclist, Gold fits the description. He ditched his car in 1993 and has gotten around Toronto on a road bike since. "My quality of life has improved since I got rid of my car," he said.

Apart from the Tour d'Afrique, Gold runs the Orient Express bike tour, which follows the 4,000-kilometre route of the legendary train from Paris to Istanbul, and the 10,800-kilometre Silk Route tour, which traces the footsteps of Marco Polo from Istanbul to Beijing.

Last year, he launched the 9,000-kilometre Vuelta Sudamerica, which starts in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, and ends in Quito, Ecuador.

Writing a blog about the Latin American tour, Gold waxed rhapsodical about it: "We left Rio de Janeiro on July 26, and today, 134 days later, we have arrived in beautiful downtown Quito. And what a ride it has been. Day after day of visual and sensual stimulation and a sense of great satisfaction."

To say that Gold is a lucky fellow would be an understatement.

He is living his dreams.

Concert makes you feel vaudeville is still alive

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Better known as the musical comedy team of Gilbert & Glick, David Gale and Randy Vancourt are reuniting for Separated At Mirth, a concert at the Blue Moon Pub on June 12.

"The concert is a celebration of our careers, together and apart," Gale says. "We had a career as a singing comedy duo for 15 years, I am Glick and he is Gilbert. Gilbert & Glick were fictitious musical theatre writers like Rogers and Hammerstein. Our act was singing songs from "Gilbert and Glick" shows. It was all comedy and parody."

The two became a fixture on the local entertainment scene playing comedy clubs, cabaret venues, theatres, fundraisers and events. In 1992, they wrote Chutzpah à Go-Go, a show about growing up Jewish in Canada, expanding it to a full show in 1993, adding two women and a Klezmer band.

"Shortly after Chutzpah a Go-Go's last run, I got into television as did Randy, I started doing Loving Spoonfuls," Gale says of the show that had him cooking with grandmas from around the world.

"During that time, we were still doing sporadic gigs together as Gilbert & Glick, but then I started getting more gigs just as myself."

The duo were asked to reunite for a fundraising for the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company last fall.

Gale says that what people are going to see in their upcoming concert is the best of Gilbert & Glick, Chutzpah à Go-Go, and the best of David Gale and Randy Vancourt.

Audiences will be treated to original songs, some magic courtesy of Vancourt, and comedy shtick, including a character Gale has been doing for the last six years, called Elvis Shmelvis – an Elvis impersonator who sings in Yiddish. Gale wants audiences to come away feeling that old-fashioned vaudeville comedy is still alive. He says this concert will have some Jewish flavour, but you don't have to be Jewish to enjoy it.

Gale describes himself as a bit of a chameleon. "People who meet me at times don't know I'm gay or Jewish, and I am always a bit surprised by that because it's not something I attempt to hide, it's just who I am," Gale says. "I grew up in a Jewish household in Winnipeg, went to a Hebrew high school, and I have a very strong cultural identification. However, when I came to Toronto I wanted to get away from that and came back to it a little later. It's who I am all the time and I'm secure and confident in it, but it isn't what I do all the time."

Gale says his influences included iconic Jewish comedians such as Danny Kaye, Mel Brooks and Jack Benny. "The Borscht Belt comics came out of being the outsiders. I would love to be able to say there will be a time that the Jews won't feel like outsiders everywhere except for Israel and New York City, perhaps… but anti-Semitism is not dead and gone. So, it gives you a sense of being an outsider looking in, which gives you a perspective on humour."

In addition to Loving Spoonfuls, the father of a son, Eli, 7, who goes to the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, hosted a dating show called Second Time Around. He continues to act on television, does voice work and was part of the yet-to-be released film Barney's Version, based on the novel by Mordecai Richler, starring Paul Giamatti and Dustin Hoffman.

Gale also serves on the executive of ACTRA Toronto as the vice-president of communications and the performers' representative, and he is on the board of the Academy of Canadian Cinema and Television. He is a family man who enjoys travelling, riding his bike and practising yoga.

Tickets include the show and snacks for $20 and are available at the door of the Blue Moon Pub, 725 Queen St. E., or by e-mailing Gale at honestman@rogers.com.

Film evokes a time and a place in Poland

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Peretzniks, Slawomir Grunberg's lovingly directed documentary about a Jewish day school in Lodz, Poland, speaks volumes about enduring friendships and the ambivalent relationship between Jews and Christians in 20th-century Poland.

Connected to an international network of schools teaching secular and humanist values, and proud of its role in nurturing Yiddish, the Peretz school in this central Polish city was probably the finest institution of its kind in Poland after the horrors of World War II.

Attended by the sons and daughters of Holocaust survivors and a smattering of Christians, primarily Seventh Day Adventists, the school gave its students a sense of community and security.

The Peretzniks, which was co- produced by the Shalom Foundation and is scheduled to be screened in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa next week, skilfully evokes a time and a place, weaving nostalgia and disappointment into its narrative.

The screenings are sponsored by the Polish Embassy in Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation, the Polish Film Institute and the Non-Fiction Foundation.

Students at the Peretz school in Lodz

The school was established in 1945 by Jews who believed that Jewish life could be resurrected in Poland.

In the aftermath of the war, Jewish survivors flocked to Lodz, which had been one-third Jewish and a key industrial centre in Poland. Lodz had not been destroyed by the Nazis, and in many cases, the Jews moved into apartments that had been vacated by the former ethnic German owners.

The Peretzniks opens with a scene in which a Polish teacher reads off the names of the school's graduates, most of whom live outside Poland today, mainly in Israel and North America. The teacher, a Catholic, taught Polish literature, and was well liked by her students.

The strongest impression the film leaves is that the students felt very Polish and part of an extended family. "It was my entire life," exclaims one man.

In quieter tones, another man says, "It provided meaning for my life."

When they meet at a reunion in Tel Aviv and Ashkelon, they exult in an explosion of joy, hugging and kissing and trading stories about their youth.

But as Grunberg – a graduate of the Polish Film School in Lodz who left Poland in 1981 and immigrated to the United States – digs deeper, he discovers interesting and disquieting facts.

The students appear to have come from working-class backgrounds. Assimilated Jews from the intelligentsia sent their children to Polish schools.

None of the students had grandparents, since they had been killed during the Holocaust. The school bound the kids together like a close-knit family, but although they were exposed to Jewish culture, some were uncomfortable with being Jewish.

Given the continued prevalence of anti-Semitism in postwar Communist Poland, the school was something of a haven. A procession of students, including Daniel Libeskind, the architect, recall the strained atmosphere and the taunts they had to endure in the city.

Ultimately, the school was unable to shelter them or their families from the bitter reality of anti-Semitism.

During and after the Six Day War in Israel, Poland, in concert with the Communist Bloc, roundly excoriated Israel as an aggressor state. Ultimately, the students were directly affected by the anti-Jewish campaign launched by the Polish Communist leadership under the thin guise of anti-Zionism.

Graduates get together at a reunion in Israel

In a stark archival clip, Wladyslaw Gomulka, then secretary general of the Communist party, delivers a fiery speech in which he denounces "Jewish nationalists" and "Zionists." With approving shouts from the audience, he urges them to leave Poland, saying that exit visas are readily available. These are by far the most chilling and troubling scenes in The Peretzniks.

Gomulka's anti-Semitic diatribe touched off a wave of Jewish emigration and spelled finis to the Peretz school. With a much smaller Jewish student body, the school had no alternative but to close, ending an era.

The students, now parents and grandparents, agree that their departure from the country they loved was difficult and painful. "We were uprooted," says a woman plaintively.

Despite their trials and tribulations, they have mostly fond memories of Poland and the school that played such a pivotal role in their formative years.

***

The Peretzniks will be screened in Toronto on Thursday, June 10, at 7:30 p.m. at the University of Toronto's Innis Town Hall. In Montreal, it will be screened on Tuesday, June 8, at 7:30 p.m. at Adams Auditorium . The Ottawa screening is on Wednesday, June 9, at 7:30 p.m. at the Alumni Auditorium, University of Ottawa.

ELVIS COSTELLO INVITED ON FREE VIP TRIP TO ISRAEL

There is so much false and malicious information circulating about Israel these days, it's no wonder that so many celebrities planning to visit Israel are pressured by the historically challenged "boycott, divestment and sanctions" crowd to stay away from the Jewish state.

How wonderful, therefore, to read of the informed and courageous responses of people such as writer Margaret Atwood, who (as reported in The CJN on May 13) visited Israel to pick up an award despite intense efforts to get her to back out. Still, the anti-Israel revisionists occasionally score a point, as they did recently in persuading British musician Elvis Costello to cancel concerts in Israel originally scheduled for June 30 and July 1.

StandWithUs, the Los Angeles-based Israel education organization, has invited Costello on a free five-star VIP tour of Israel to coincide with his wife, singer Diane Krall's performance there on Aug. 4, or at any time that is more convenient to him. (No word yet on whether Costello has accepted.)

"Misinformation about the Palestinian-Israeli conflict is rife, particularly in Costello's England, where the press often misrepresents history and current facts on the ground," said Roz Rothstein, the organization's CEO. StandWithUs has urged Costello to consult with fellow Brit Paul McCartney, who rejected Palestinian and Arab pressure to cancel his 2008 tour, and with Madonna, who called Israel "the energy centre of the world" before a crowd of 50,000 Israelis during her performance in 2009.

Yiddish books are available for downloading

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

The recent deaths of Abraham Sutzkever and Inna Hecker Grade, the wife of Chaim Grade, might be taken as further evidence of the inevitable eclipse of Yiddish.

Sutzkever remained a mainstay of the tradition late into his long life, overseeing the publication of the periodical Di goldene keyt in Israel, and publishing excellent work of his own that was well translated.

Chaim Grade has been gone for more than 25 years, and the story of his widow's management of his literary estate is a strange one. Upon Hecker Grade's death this month in the Bronx, her two executors revealed a trove of manuscripts and other materials upon which she had sat, guardedly, rather than allow them to be properly edited and circulated as published texts.

Norman Ravvin

It seems likely that some of Chaim Grade's unpublished works will find their way into print and gain a new audience for a writer who is not nearly as well known as I.B. Singer or some of the major Yiddish poets.

Ironically, however, recent technological shifts have by far increased the availability of Yiddish books to the average Yiddish-reading buyer. The simplest form of access is the kind of book buying that would have once required a certain amount of sleuthing – say, a trip to the Strand Book Store in Manhattan – but now is served by Internet sites that connect buyers with bookstores across the United States.

It was through this method that I came to own a reasonably well-maintained copy of Melech Ravitch's 1966 Yiddish translation of Franz Kafka's The Trial. Aside from the pleasures of reading Kafka's famous opening in Yiddish ("hot men im in ein sheynem frimorgn arestirt"), the text itself is a remarkable artifact. Published in New York City, with a few illustrations reminiscent of Ben Shahn, my edition was at one time in the collection at the educational department of the Knitgoods Workers Union on Broadway Avenue in New York. Its biographical note on Kafka tells readers that his Jewish name was Amschel, something English-language editions are not likely to bother with.

A more elaborate source for Yiddish books is the Massachusetts-based Yiddish Book Center, founded and run by ex-Montrealer Aaron Lansky, where a huge collection of Yiddish books is maintained. More recently, with funding from movie director Steven Spielberg, the centre has begun scanning its collection, so books are available for downloading and printing. Printing a 400-page novel is not necessarily an attractive option, but after finding a short children's novel by Joseph Opatoshu unavailable for straightforward purchase, I printed its 30 pages. My homemade facsimile doesn't have the charge of the Ravitch volume, with its Ladies' Garment Workers heritage, but it's done the job.

Opatoshu, a native of Mlawa, north of Warsaw, is, like Grade, a giant among Yiddish novelists who is little known or read today.

His children's story, coincidentally called Der Mishpet (The Trial), was originally printed in a Warsaw Yiddish journal and appeared in book form in 1952 from a Yiddish book publisher in Buenos Aires. Its availability as an online file allows readers to sneak free of the Yiddish canon and find their way to a forgotten text that represents aspects of the literary tradition that we no longer remember existed.

Opatoshu, in the biographical note included with his text, descended from what he called "forest Jews," and his fiction often focused on the relationship between Jews and Poles in the countryside, whether this meant writing about horse thieves, or, in the case of Der Mishpet, children who ride, Tom Sawyerlike, on skiffs on the Vistula River. A noteworthy presence in the story are a colourful array of Polish words, most of them associated with the countryside, and Opatoshu's tendency to describe Jewish characters as peasantlike, contrary to the stereotype often presented in contemporary literature of Polish-Jewish animosity and difference.

Even more surprising is Opatoshu's use of motifs from Polish legend, including Princess Wanda, said to inhabit the Vistula River, and whose story is central to Polish national identity and pride. As it turns out, the trial mentioned in the story's title is among storks, whom Opatoshu presents as a kind of tribe judging one of their own. Here, Poland's national bird becomes key to what the author wants to convey to Yiddish-speaking children.

Upon discovering the trove of materials in the Grades' Bronx apartment, Lansky was quoted as saying, "This is our thrilling moment in Yiddish literature, this is our Dead Sea Scrolls." And so it may be, but similar kinds of recovery are in fact a part of the Yiddish everyday scene online.

Dreamer's diary may be brought to life

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Norman Gulko is looking up at his wife. He can't make love to her, he can only watch as she dances, eyes closed. He wants to hold her, he begins to kiss her. And then he wakes up. And writes it all down.

Gulko, 87, first started dreaming about Florence, his wife, shortly after her death in 1980.

"About two weeks after Flo died, I had a dream of her. It was like she came to visit me. I figured if I recorded it, it's like having it with me," he said.

And he did.

Gulko spent 22 years recording his dreams of Florence, which he later learned were bereavement dreams. Some focused on her appearance – her black hair, her dark eyes, others were about her ovarian cancer.

And now, the dreams will be made into a movie – half documentary, half dream sequence, by James Marsh, an Academy Award-winning director.

Academy-Award winning director looks to make documentary

Gulko's journey from dreams to documentary started in 1996, when he submitted his diary to Kathryn Belicki, a professor of psychology at Brock University, after watching her discuss bereavement dreaming on a talk show.

"I thought my dreams were very original, but they weren't. Only when listening to the interview did I realize the recording of them was my way of coping with grief."

Belicki published a research paper based on his dreams and introduced Gulko to William Domhoff, a professor at the University of California at Santa Cruz with a website devoted to recording dreams. This is where Marsh first learned about Florence's nighttime visits.

"I was totally captivated by that diary. I saw within it those contours of [Gulko's] relationship with his wife. The dreams spoke of that. This was someone he cared about and was deeply in love with," Marsh said.

While reading through Gulko's dreams, Marsh saw more than just a diary. He saw a love story.

"He didn't just record any old dream… It was specific, thematic, based on this one person, this one relationship, which was profoundly deep and romantic," Marsh said. "They're unusual and purely devoted to one subject, and therefore you have something to work with, you have a structure."

In 2007, Marsh contacted Gulko through Domhoff.

"We began an e-mail dialogue. [I said], 'I want to make a film inspired by your dreams, and I don't know what form it will take.' He was just open to that idea and receptive to it."

Because the concept of a documentary through a dream sequence is a unique one, Marsh had challenges raising money for the film, which he is still in the process of raising.

"If I said to a film producer, 'I want to make a film about an old man's dreams,' they'll say, 'What the f--k are you doing.' … The challenge isn't just creative, the genre of the film is unique, too. It hasn't been done before," he said.

In January 2010, he spent 2-1/2 days filming with Gulko, which included interviews, reading out 60 of Gulko's 150 recorded dreams and following him to the cemetery. Marsh hopes to continue filming in the fall.

For Gulko, the experience was a difficult one.

"It was hard having to relive some of my experiences. One of the fascinating things, this was a very experienced camera crew. After the filming, they turned to me and thanked me for letting them into an intimate part of my life," he said.

Only while listening to the interviews did Gulko realize why he spent so long recording his dreams.

"[It was] my way of coping with grief. When a man dies, women have girlfriends. Guys don't have boyfriends. In my case… the minute we got up from shivah, I was completely alone. Through bereavement dreaming, I was speaking to myself about my loss," he said.

Norman Gulko sits next to a photo of his late wife, Florence. His dream diaries, which record every dream he's had of her for 22 years, will be the basis of a film by James Marsh.

Mets rookie Ike Davis looks like the real deal

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — "Ike" is the nickname and baseball is his game. And from early appearances, it seems the man can flat out play the great American pastime at the big league level. What's more, this rookie who plays first base for the New York Mets has power, hits for average, can field and happens to be Jewish.

Isaac Benjamin Davis, 23, grew up in Edina, a suburb southwest of Minneapolis. He's the son of a Jewish mother, Millie Davis, who named him after her grandfather.

In late April, in an interview with New York sportswriter Dave Waldstein, Davis shared the fact that "a large portion of his family on his mother's side, which was from Lithuania, perished in the Holocaust."

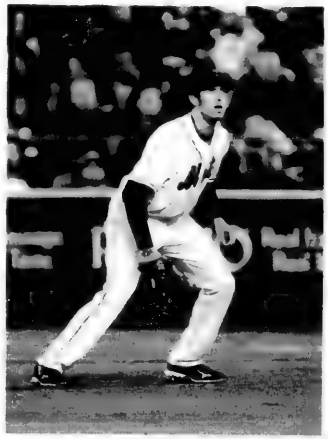
Davis also added that he learned about his family's history by doing family trees as part of school projects. He also noted that his great-aunt on his mother's side was a Holocaust survivor who immigrated to the United States. It was through her that the family story has been preserved.

His dad is Houston-born former major league pitcher Ron Davis, who never started a game in the majors. Instead, he made his mark as a reliever, appearing in 481 games. He saved 130 and had a won-lost record of 47-53 and an ERA of 4.05 with the Yankees and Twins from 1978 to 1988

Ike was originally drafted out of Chaparral High School in Scottsdale, Ariz., where he helped his team win three state titles. The Tampa Bay Rays selected him in the first round (19th overall) of the 2006 draft, but he chose not to sign and instead registered at Arizona State University (ASU), where he earned a degree and polished his game.

He was drafted again in the opening round in 2008 (18th overall), becoming Mets property and had the distinction of being the first Jew to play for the Mets since former Blue Jays outfielder Shawn Green, who ended his career in New York in 2006-07.

(Another popular Jewish Met was outfielder Art Shamsky, a platoon player between 1968 and 1972, who was instrumental in helping the 1969 Mets to a World Series victory over the Baltimore Orioles.)



Ike Davis

While Davis is a first baseman in the the majors, in college, he was also a pitcher and outfielder. In 2006 he was named Pac-10 newcomer of the year, becoming the first freshman ever to lead the league in RBIs during the regular season. A variety of All-American honors followed when he averaged .353 during his days on campus, totalling 244 hits, 33 homers and 69 doubles.

As for his part-time pitching record with the ASU Sun Devils, his career numbers show Davis had a 7-5 mark with four saves and 78 strikeouts.

Davis made it difficult for the Mets to ignore him in spring training, batting .480 while hitting three homers and 10 RBI. The powers that be thought he ought to play at the AAA level in order to gain experience.

Last year with St Lucie in the Florida State League Class A, he hit .333 with five home runs in his last 14 games before moving up to Double-A Birmingham in June, reports Baseball Prospectus. "There, despite the great challenge, Davis, if anything, got even better, hitting .309 with 13 home runs in his 55 games with the B-Mets, followed by a .341 mark in the Arizona Fall League."

Following fewer than two weeks in AAA with the Buffalo Bisons of the International League, the 6-4, 215-pound slugger was summoned to the Big Apple, where he appears to be a big deal. In 113 at bats in his first 34 games, he was hitting .283, which included nine doubles, four taters and 12 RBIs.

But can he field? In one mid-May game, Davis chased down a high fly foul ball that was going to land in the Mets' dugout. He took the guard rail in the midsection, flipped upside down and almost landed on his melon. Lucky for him, it was his own team's dugout and the players on the bench darted to his rescue, perhaps preventing serious injury. He made the catch and held it high as if he was doing an impersonation of the Statue of Liberty.

A catch like me

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

"Wait 'til you meet my new wife!" says my cousin over the phone from Israel. "I'm sure you're gonna love her!"

"See you next week, right after you visit Niagara Falls for your honeymoon," I say.

Meir and I prepare the guest room.

"He's such an amazing catch! Who can find a tall, dark, handsome engineer?" I say, dreamily.

Meir looks at me. "I'm a tall, dark engineer," he reminds me.

"Yeah, but you don't count," I say, noting the obvious.

And then we meet her. You'd never suspect she's been in a beauty contest (not even as a judge). She's has (to put it charitably) a dominant nose, frizzy dark hair and her grace plays hide-and-seek, and wins by a landslide.

She looks at me severely as I try to hug her, then says with almost closed lips "You're such a sentimental family, aren't you?"

"So," I say as they finish unpacking, "how do you like married life?" (I know they just got married, but such comments are part of my charm.)

"Well," she says toughly, "it's still early days."

I add, "Still, I can see he really spoils you. I've never had a honeymoon in Canada!"

She looks at me with narrowed eyes. "What exactly do you mean by, and I quote, 'He spoils me?'"

I get a bit scared – what's the deal with the narrowed eyes? – as she continues, "If you meant that he's paid for the trip, note that his money is mine now. And another thing: he should be grateful I agreed to marry him. I had a lot of options to choose from [Give. Me. A. Break!]. And another thing: am I wrong, or have you put us in a room with no TV?"

Meir puts a bowl of cookies in front of her. My cousin begs her to try them. "Meir baked them for you," he whispers.

"Nevertheless, I'll try one," she replies.

"I'm coming right over, baby!" (Baby?!) my cousin says when beckoned after dinner.

"Why didn't you tell them I love shrimp? So they keep kosher. Does that mean I have to?"

We sit silently on the couch. I drink my coffee. ("You don't even have a coffee machine? You really haven't 'made it' in Canada, huh?")

"Well?" beams my cousin. "What do you think of her?"

I take another long sip. "Isn't she amazing?" he asks. "She's the smartest woman I've ever met! She's so clever, not to mention her beauty!" (Help, I'm dying here!)

"She needed a lot of persuasion to marry me, but finally she agreed. She's kind [Oh, God] and successful [C'mon, she doesn't even have a job!]"

I have to cut him short: "And arrogant and snobbish," I add.

"And the list goes on and on!" he summarizes.

The next couple of days, I'm tempted to turn on the gas oven and put her head (or mine, if she puts up a fight) in there for good. I'm learning from her that my sweet, rich, sexy cousin is "no good in business, or in bed, or in anything."

I'm also learning that he'd better call a lawyer if she finds even so much as a fold in the trousers he irons for her so devotedly (size 20, mind you).

And then, thank God, they leave.

"We might come back," she threatens, using a frightening twist of her lips. (A smile perhaps?)

I lie in bed furious.

"Next time, watch for the signs," I tell Meir. "When dogs start whimpering, flowers start wilting and blood starts coming out of the walls, we'll know she's in town."

Meir looks at me puzzled. "What? You didn't like her?" he asks. "I was sure you did – after all, as they say, like attracts like."

Pole walking: changing how we move

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Recently I had the opportunity to try urban pole walking. What a great workout! I was surprised at how much fun and easy it was.

I've seen it in parks around Toronto – groups of people walking together with poles. Pole walking, or Nordic walking as it's also called, was invented in 1970 in Finland as a cross-training option for competitive skiers. Very much like cross-country skiing but without the skis or snow, pole walking is a fantastic full-body, cardiovascular workout that anyone can do, no matter your age or health condition.

There's an overwhelming amount of research that shows the benefits of pole walking, which include improved balance, posture and stability; reduced impact on knee joints, and improvement in fall prevention and chronic conditions such as arthritis, heart disease, diabetes, Parkinson's and back pain.

Pole walking has been popular in Europe for decades, and Germany believes in its long-term health benefits so much that pole training instruction is covered by health insurance.

Pole walking uses 90 per cent of your muscles and burns 20 per cent more calories than walking alone. It promotes increased circulation throughout the body, improves posture and corrects breathing. The action of pressing down on the poles reduces stress on the lower joints by 30 per cent by transferring the force to the arms and then the poles, allowing people with arthritis, Parkinson's and knee or hip replacements to enjoy the cardiovascular benefits of walking. Pole walking has also been found to increase muscle endurance, core strength and bone density.

What's so great about pole walking is how easy it is. All you do is adjust the pole to how tall you are and off you go, no matter where you are. Pole walking groups are popping up all over the Toronto area, in places such as Edwards Gardens and High Park. Pole walking has become so popular that you can purchase specially designed poles almost anywhere.

Do something different: add poles to your walk today and make it a full-body workout.

Oh What a Stupid People We Can Be

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Israel is in big trouble. The Jewish people are in peril. How can one think otherwise?

The key players in the Middle East brouhaha today are Iran, Hamas, Hezbollah, the Palestine Liberation Organization and Syria. Each of them is governed by cruel men who are frothing and dripping anti-Israel feelings and anti-Semitic beliefs.

Israel is sandwiched between them, commonly fending off a barrage of missiles hurled at her citizens – our people.

We, the Jewish people and the State of Israel, are blessed to have enemies who will suicide to death in their cause. Their passion runs deep. We are their passion. A beheading to them is a victory. Their schoolyard bullying tactics designed to inflict mental and physical grief on the Jewish people seem to give them pleasure.

A recent animated video released by Hamas showing Gilad Schalit's (the Jewish people's most famous hostage ever) father wandering the streets only to find the coffin of his son is expressive of the heartless nature of our enemy.

While Israel is a rough and tough nation, it's diminutive, challenged by the affairs any country would be, and constantly confronted by outer forces intent upon its destruction.

An entity of loathing has arisen once again and threatens to destroy us, once again. The Hamas charter states (quoting Mohammad), "The Day of Judgment will not come about until Muslims fight the Jews (killing the Jews)... The stones and trees will say O Muslims, O Abdulla, there is a Jew behind me, come and kill him."

We seem to be their every breath. What to do?

Reading this, it's difficult for most of us, I'm sure, to determine the natural level of sensitivity that lies inside the Arab soul. Who in fact are the children of Ishmael? What do they really want from us? What is our task in all of this?

How is it they loathe and scorn us so, and will tirelessly donate a gold coin of vengeance and ruin toward operations levied at Israel and the Jewish people? On the face of it, it seems Hamas, Hezbollah and their wretched Iranian (government) brother live to strategize on means of obliterating us. Why do they froth so at our existence?

I do not believe, unlike many of my family, friends and colleagues, that all Arabs/Muslims fall into this category. I do believe, however, that a small minority can shower utter devastation on us if they keep at it. Of this, I am not naive.

So where do we go with this? Staring at this bleak future are we to continue playing poker on Tuesday nights unabated? Are we to pretend life is fine and that the Israel Defence Forces, Canada, the Americans and sometimes the Brits will protect us?

Do we sit around pretending history will not repeat itself, that everything will be just fine?

Or are we, in the back of our insecure Jewish minds, preparing for the eventual onslaught of tyranny and anti-Semitism we studied about in Talmud Torah?

You know my friends, we do not have a plan. There is no collective grassroots and organizational plan to understand and stave off anti-Semitism. Nobody is thinking about our enemy and friends in the entire world, and ways to fight our enemies and embrace our friends. If they are, let me know if you've been contacted.

Are the banishing of all English Jews, the Spanish Inquisition, the Chmielnicki Uprising and the Dreyfus Affair things of the past?

Oh what a stupid people we can be.

Hire an entertainer to spice up a party

By JENNIFER LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

Swaye Entertainment (416-545-0741) is one of Canada's most comprehensive entertainment booking companies. Founder Adam Swaye is a professional and award-winning magician who has performed at casinos, resorts, trade shows and corporate parties for more than 15 years.

Swaye represents high-end magicians, mentalists, psychics, fortune tellers and other entertainers, and he refers them to clients looking for entertainment at their weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs or other simchahs.

Adam Swaye

"Because of the high-end events I attend, I know other high-end performers" says Swaye. "This means I'm able to guarantee the absolute best entertainment."

Most commonly, clients will choose to hire an entertainer for the cocktail hour of an event before the dinner and dancing starts. "When people are waiting around there is a captive audience and people – kids especially – need to be entertained."

Clients can call Swaye Entertainment to request a specific performer, or they can ask Swaye for recommendations.

"Since I go to so many events, I know which performers work with each demographic."

For bar and bat mitzvahs, or for other events where there will be many children and teens, interactive entertainers are the most popular. This includes entertainers such as mentalists who include the audience in their show by reading their minds or making objects disappear.

"People also love caricature artists – they create great souvenirs."

Swaye Entertainment can also recommend an entertainer for smaller functions.

"Women love psychics. We've had some good success with these for events like bachelorette parties."

Mentalists, magicians and other performers can come to your home.

For the widest choice of entertainers, Swaye recommends booking as far ahead as possible. Performers start from about $375 for the first hour. Swaye offers all clients a money back guarantee if they or their guests are not satisfied.

"I never want my clients to have to worry about quality not being there. People wofk hard to throw events and I want them to be able to trust us."

Specialty suppliers offer candy and prizes

By JENNIFER LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

Throwing the perfect party involves making lots of decisions. With so many choices to make, many people are eager to hand off some of the decision making to experts. Luckily, there are two Toronto based companies – Kosher 'N Natural and Incredible Novelties – that are eager to help.

As one of the largest kosher candy stores in Toronto, Kosher 'N Natural (416-789-7173) has provided candies and other sweet treats for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs and other simchahs for the last 28 years. "It's truly candies galore. Clients can pick exactly what they want to customize the event to their tastes" says Jack Schnoll of Kosher 'N Natural. In addition to offering a wide selection of candy, Kosher 'N Natural rents machines that make other treats, including candy floss, doughnuts, snow cones and chocolate fountains.

Kosher 'N Natural can help create customized centrepieces for the tables using candies or other novelty items such as balloons or flowers. The simchah basket is one centrepiece that is becoming increasingly popular. "This is a package of toys, canned goods or other supplies that will go to homeless or low-income families in the GTA," says Schnoll. In the past, simchah baskets have been donated to Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, Hadassah and Jewish Family and Child. "Even on their special occasions many people still want to help the greater community."

Favours from Incredible Novelties

Kosher 'N Natural prides itself on meeting a high level of customer satisfaction. "We're now doing the weddings of clients whose bar mitzvahs we did 10 years ago." They are now booking events through the end of 2010.

After candy and centrepieces are chosen, party planners then need to purchase party favours. Incredible Novelties (905-663-9900), founded nine years ago by former DJs Saul Sacks and Dan Jankelow, can help with that.

" We are a one-stop shop for all prizes and giveaways," says Sacks. "People come to us with their ideas, and we can bring them to life while staying within their budget."

"Because we are former DJs, we know the party scene," says Sacks. "We are able to tell clients not only what they need but also how much of it, to prevent people from purchasing too much."

Clients can come to Incredible Novelties with a party theme in mind and are then shown the types of favours available. A customized package is created and the novelties are delivered to the venue location on the day of the party. "This creates a truly stress-free experience because they don't need to think about it again," says Sacks.

Incredible Novelties is a trendsetter in the party favour industry and offers prizes and giveaways that represent the latest cultural trends. "We like to keep things fresh, so kids are getting new things at every party they go to. T-shirts and other memorabilia with sports teams and celebrities are some of the most popular items."

Incredible Novelties will also customize any item as a personalized souvenir of the event. "We do water bottles, T-shirts, chocolate bars, you name it," says Sacks. "Anything to make our clients parties exactly what they hoped for."

Unique sweets for your special simchah

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

It's always the special touches that make a party memorable.

Lucky for party planners, there are two local companies that offer unique treats for your simchah. Nutcracker Sweet (416-782-3232; gifts@nutcracker-sweet.com) offers everything from centrepieces to loot bags.

Brandon Frimet, a partner in the company, said people were shocked when the company moved from its Avenue Road location, where it had been for about 26 years.

The new facility is near Sheppard Avenue and Chesswood Drive, where they operate both the offices and the warehouse. This lets them better serve the growing demand throughout North America, said Frimet.

His aunt started the company about 27 years ago selling bulk foods, but eventually moved toward creating gift baskets.

Customers can visit the retail store in Scotia Plaza in Toronto's downtown core, where they can actually see the products before they place their orders.

The central location means that about 200,000 people walk by the store on a daily basis, Frimet said.

In addition to parties, Nutcracker Sweet also sells baskets for the Jewish holidays, such as Passover and Rosh Hashanah. These gifts contain unique, kosher, high-end sweets, different from their regular catalogue.

In the future, Frimet says customers can look forward to new treats and brands in their baskets.

For something a bit more exotic, Sweet Sushi (416-988-7403, jessica@sweetsushi.ca) might be just the ticket.

Non-Kosher

Instead of raw fish, this sushi is made with sweets. Rather than soy sauce, wasabi and ginger, customers can eat this "sushi" with gourmet chocolate sauce, cream cheese and orange chocolate.

The company began with Jessica Schwartz's kitchen cooking experiments. Schwartz, who has been cooking for years, graduated from George Brown College's culinary management program about four years ago. Sweet Sushi started about three years prior to that.

The sweets are low in fat, Schwartz said, with platters ranging in size from extra small to extra large.

Although some of the rolls share names with popular sushi dishes, they don't share much more than the design. Instead of shrimp, avocado, and fish eggs, her dynamite rolls are aptly named for the pop rocks rolled inside.

The company began to grow when Schwartz created a website and advertised on Facebook in April 2009.

She continues to run it with her mother and sister, catering to every kind of event by providing them with entirely unique sweets.

"No one else that I know makes sweet sushi," she said. "It's a completely original recipe."

Ketubah.com celebrates 14 years with contest

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

It's official! Ketubah Ketubah, is marking its 14th anniversary with a name change.

The innovative online ketubah company (www.Ketubah.com) will now be known as Ketubah.com, says company founder and president Michael Shapiro. "We were the first online specialty ketubah store. The company was online before Google existed."

Along with the name change, Shapiro is announcing a major give-away in honour of the company's 14th anniversary.

"Every week for the next 14 weeks, we'll be giving away a ketubah valued at up to $350 from our Signature Collection. This is a line of gorgeous limited edition fine art prints exclusive to Ketubah.com. We have just added our 200th design to the Signature Collection," Shapiro says.

The contest is open to anyone over 18, he says. "They can enter every week on our website or on Facebook or Twitter."

Ketubah.com offers its clients a selection of more than 750 designs from more than 80 artists, with many of the ketubot available in different sizes and price points

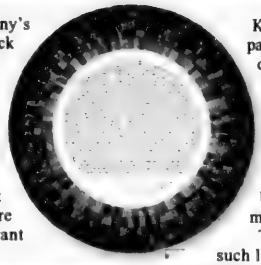
"The ketubot start at $100. We have something for every budget," Shapiro says.

"We also have parents' gift prints and home blessings. The home blessings match the ketubot in the Signature Collection."

Shapiro prides himself on the company's fast service. "We get incredible feedback for our timely response."

He says that while Ketubah.com is an "online showroom," the website is "backed up with friendly, knowledgeable and great customer service." (You can reach them at 416-963-9191.)

Ketubah.com offers both lithographs and giclée prints. Shapiro explains that giclée is a technique whereby inks are sprayed onto paper to create a "vibrant look."



Ketubah.com uses archival inks and papers, he adds. "The ketubot are heirloom quality. They're stunning. They'll last as long as the longest marriage."

The designs range from traditional to art deco and postmodern, Shapiro says, noting that a popular trend is to have a ketubah printed on canvas.

He stresses that ketubah text may be personalized. "People can mix and match designs and text."

The Signature Collection includes such local artists as Temma Gentles, Ruth Stern Warzecha, Moshe Mikanovsky, Laya Crust, Marina Pinto Miller and Dafna Jalon.

"Temma Gentles is a wonderful fabric artist. I know her through the local Judaica shows. We approached her and she created this gorgeous ketubah called Katagami-Indigo."

Stern Warzecha is an established calligrapher and paper-cut artist. He describes paper-cutting as a traditional technique whereby an intricate design is cut out of a sheet of paper. For added effect and contrast, it can be layered over a coloured piece of paper. "This gorgeous ketubah is available in various coloured backgrounds."

"The selection we offer is amazing," says Shapiro. "Ketubah.com is the best place anywhere to get a ketubah.

"It's a service that works really well for busy modern couples. We aim to make the ketubah-shopping process as effortless as possible."

Tzatz features unique fashions that flatter

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

If cookie-cutter dressing just ain't your thing, Tzatz (http://www.tzatz.ca/) is the perfect store for you!

Specializing in unique designer fashions and accessories for boomer-aged women – or shall we say from 35 to 39 and holding – Tzatz has expanded from its humble roots as a small kiosk at Harbourfront's Queen's Quay Terminal, where it started in 1987, into two locations – the flagship store at Yonge Street and Castlefield Avenue (416-481-0311) and the recently opened addition in Leaside on Bayview Ave (416-646-1146).

Carrying a wide array of dressy-casual, party and relaxed career-style items, and even premium pyjamas from sizes two to 16, Tzatz is owned and run by the brother and sister team of Stephen and Susan Lokash (Tzatz is named after Susan's childhood nickname). They believe that uniqueness is a fundamental element to dressing well. Almost everything in their stores has a touch of novelty. The clothes are sourced on regular buying trips to New York and Los Angeles. Since some of quality names featured at Tzatz are generally not otherwise available in Canada, the clothes you purchase at Tzatz are guaranteed to be unique.

"Customers continue their love affair with Elisa Cavaletti's exquisitely detailed blouses and the remarkable cut and styling of Fidelity jeans, which are a favourite of both Hollywood jet-setters and North Toronto moms alike," says Stephen Lokash. "Our fashions are slimming, a little forgiving and always flattering, and we spend much time sourcing fashions that not only fit well, but have design details that smooth and camouflage problem areas without sacrificing style or comfort." At Tzatz, shoppers always enjoy quality fabrics that stretch but don't stretch out, and are comfortable and easy to wear.

Rather than pinpointing trends that may come and go, Lokash cites products that slim and flatter as the must-have items in the store. "You'll get compliments left, right and centre if you follow the 4 "L's": longer, looser and layered over leggings," he says.

"It's nice to see that dresses are back, too, as classic feminine styles are reinvented in modern, easy-care fabrics. Finish any outfit with a great necklace and earrings, and shoppers are ready to shine at their next night out."

Because Tzatz gears their clothing to a boomer-specific clientele, they can make sure that no need or occasion is overlooked and that their customers don't have to dig through a sea of unsuitable options to find their perfect look.

Tzatz has new product coming into the stores every few weeks to ensure that there's always something new and unique to choose from. "We want customers to look their best and feel thinner, current, sexier, confident and gorgeous," says Lokash.

"While our wonderful product is one reason behind the success of our company, remarkable staff is the other. Tzatz associates are professional, knowledgable and best of all, never pushy," says Lokash.

Stephen and Susan are so proud of their staff, they've put pictures of everyone on the hangtags of every item they sell."Our friendly teams of well-trained fashionistas are dedicated to providing shoppers with quick, easy service and honest advice," says Stephen Lokash. "It's company policy to tell shoppers when something doesn't look quite right. Great looking customers are our best advertising, and making lifelong customers is our passion. Gorgeous, lifelong customers, that is."

Another fashion place advertising in this supplement is St. Honore's, 416-449-2672.

Host your simchah in the best places

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

If someone said you could host your simchah in the best venues in Toronto and still have it kosher, would you pinch yourself, just a little, to be sure you weren't dreaming? Well, stop pinching and start dialling (or browsing!), because Caterers York and Copper Creek Golf Club want you to have it all: a kosher simchah in the city's most beautiful settings, whatever your tastes may be.

Copper Creek Golf Club (905-893-3370, http://www.coppercreek.ca) isn't just for golfers; it's for anyone looking to hold an event in a breathtaking setting amid rolling hills, glorious gardens and the spectacular Humber River. "It's a much more beautiful setting than an industrial-mall banquet hall," says director of operations Chris Neale.

With an outdoor gazebo area overlooking the valley that's just the perfect spot for a chupah, Copper Creek easily handles any kosher function for up to 400. "The venue lends itself to great pictures," Neale says.

Copper Creek's views and picturesque banquet facility captivate most people immediately, says Neale. "When they come here, it's usually an instant decision."

Meeting and conference facilities are also available, offering warm, attentive service in the same magnificent setting.

And, of course, golf lovers also flock to Copper Creek: with an on-site kosher kitchen, a complete kosher golf tournament for up to 144 people is easy to arrange.

The quality and creativity of the food match the exceptional setting, Neale says. "Our kosher food is outstanding." Pan-seared salmon with ginger shiitake sauce and brandied chocolate and banana crêpes may not be most people's preconceived idea of what a kosher meal will look like, but Copper Creek specializes in creating events that are out of the ordinary.

Three sample menus – fish, chicken and beef – are available on Copper Creek's website, but menus are easy to customize to suit your needs.

While Copper Creek's location near Kleinburg, Ont., may seem daunting, it's actually very easily accessible. Just north of Major Mackenzie, it's only a 35-minute drive from downtown Toronto and only 15 minutes from Toronto International Airport.

If you're looking for a venue that's more central, or a little out of the ordinary, look no further than Caterers York (416-783-4293; http://www.caterersyork.com). Caterers York has operated for 51 years and is now the exclusive caterer to Adath Israel, Beth Tikvah, Beth David and Beth Sholom

More than just a "shul caterer," Caterers York operates almost anywhere and regularly co-ordinates events in locations like the Toronto Botanical Gardens, the Science Centre, the Hilton Garden Inn and Atlantis Pavilions. They'll also arrange for full-service in-home events. "We provide every detail that's necessary," says Bill Batista. "Staff, rentals, liquor, food, every detail the host requests."

Generally, hosts choose a venue first, based on their tastes and the size of the event. Then, they contact Caterers York and select a menu from a constantly changing array of three-course dinners, butler-style hors d'oeuvres, desserts and more.

Caterers York is passionate about keeping their food selections current. "We're always creating," Batista says, designing cutting-edge dishes that look and taste fantastic. Sesame-crusted salmon and zesty Chicken Marbella are just two of his recent creations. "We created our own way of producing it."

Although menus are constantly being updated, sometimes a past client comes in and requests a dish that was served at an event 20 years ago. "I have kept my menus since 1980," says Batista. He'll go back and recreate the favourite dish, even occasionally adding older items back onto the menu if he feels current clients will enjoy them.

In addition to full catering services, Caterers York also offers a takeout menu from its Adath Israel location, which includes a range of classic chicken and salmon entrées, along with soups, salads and side dishes suitable for Shabbat and holidays, shivah meals or other smaller events.

Whether it's the Negev Dinner for 1,200 at the Fairmont Royal York in downtown Toronto or an event for 100 at the MaRS building on College Street, every function is handled efficiently with a personal touch. "We stand with the client from the day that they book to the evening of saying goodnight… we're always present at every party," Batista says.

Batista's son recently asked him why he stays in this business after almost 45 years. "How do you handle people? How do you not go crazy?" he asked.

Batista simply replied, "I love this business." He adores being part of people's happy occasions, and says he tries very hard to help clients understand just how special their event truly is. Wherever the simchah is held, "they should enjoy it," Batista says. "Enjoy what they're doing, enjoy the wedding that they're doing for their kids."

Caterers York: all-kosher but capacity and accessibility probably varies by venue.

Let Hairafter make you even more beautiful

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

A visit to a salon or spa is a calming, stress-relieving and rejuvenating experience. Being pampered by a pro is one way to indulge or reward yourself, but it's also a way to impress guests at an upcoming party or event.

At Hairafter Salon & Spa, 644 Finch Ave. E., owner and master hairstylist John Colombo is recognized by customers for his confidence and skills. Colombo and his staff are among the best in the world, with reputations in the industry for offering their clients highly personalized service and cutting-edge technique.

Colombo, the highly acclaimed founder of Hairafter, has accumulated numerous honours and awards in the styling field and has judged many different international competitions throughout his career. His son, Gian Paolo, Hairafter's director, was a finalist in the North American Hairstyling Contest, winning newcomer of the year.

Hairafter has been a trend-setting upscale salon for almost 40 years, combining posh, elegant and state-of-the-art facilities with a warm and welcoming family atmosphere.

Colombo says he started the business because he loves "to make beautiful people more beautiful," which, he said, is always rewarding.

The atmosphere at Hairafter is so homey that three generations of customers frequent the salon, which provides a variety of services for both men and women.

Its tradition of styling innovation emphasizes the key elements of colour, cut and design in a complementary manner that's suited to each individual client.

Trims, cuts, colour and hair extensions are among the salon's most requested services, along with eyebrow tweezing and tinting, make-up application, facials and hair removal.

Hairafter Creations

"We help clients get ready for any occasion, including bar mitzvahs, weddings, holidays, birthdays, graduations and proms," Colombo says.

Pedicures and manicures are also available "to assure that every inch of a client is ready to face the world," and the salon guarantees that nails will be "better than natural" with acrylic, fiberglass and gel applications.

Customers can even enjoy spa services such as reflexology massage, or relax with a drink from the complimentary coffee bar.

When you're invited to a formal party or gala, Colombo says customers want head-to-toe preparation. "This can start with a consultation with a stylist, followed by doing a pre-run and always emphasizing what works best for the client."

In terms of hair trends, volume is back, he says, and big sexy hair combined with texture, waves and movement are in demand.

"To look your best for an event, it's important to keep it simple. Less is more. A few bends with the curling iron or twists with the flat iron do a great job," Colombo says.

For brides or women involved in a wedding ceremony, romantic natural-looking hair is in fashion. For half-up, half-down updos, the hair is set with rollers or the curling iron to achieve big, soft waves.

Whatever the simchah, Hairafter can accommodate your needs. For more information or to make an appointment, call 416-221-6658.

Rain Spa Salon

Secret Garden Spa (1-888-669-5566, www.vintage-hotels.com/princeofwales/spa.htm), located at the Prince of Wales Hotel, is a contemporary space that is accented by the soothing elements of earth, fire and water. As well as boasting a full array of spa and salon treatments such as facials, massages, manicures and pedicures, Secret Garden offers a number of unique "Specialtea" spa treatments that use natural products made with the finest green, white and rooibos teas. Ingredients such as polyphenols and antioxidants that offer several health benefits are all essential elements in treatments such as the Green Tea and Sugar Cane Pedicure and the Silk Road Tea Facial. Moreover, Secret Garden offers a selection of specialty facials by Biodroga Systems, known for their exclusive biological beauty care.

While 100 Fountain and Secret Garden are the perfect spas for a one-day excursion or a weekend of relaxation, they are also wonderful places for a bride and her party to kick back and relax before the big day. When booking a party of six or more people, the bride will receive a complimentary manicure or pedicure. Each person with the party will also receive a 10 per cent discount on spa treatments and retail products. If the bride prefers to pamper on her own, there's Bride's Bliss ($220 per person). She'll enjoy 145 minutes of spa pleasures, including a Honey Citrus Scrub, Swedish massage and a manicure.

All play and no work makes for a great time

By STEPHEN SWEET
Special to The CJN

If you're looking for a low-mess, high-energy birthday celebration for your child, then maybe you should move the party outside your home.

Lucky Strike Lanes
Non-Kosher

Lucky Strike Lanes and Loots Lounge are just two of many options available for parties that allow for a good time and minimal work on the parents' part.

Jodi Vogelhut of Lucky Strike Lanes (905-760-9931, bowluckystrike.com), located in an area with ample parking and right off of Highway 400, believes that a celebration held outside your home is a lot easier than one held inside it.

"First of all, you don't have to set up or clean up," Vogelhut said. "We have front-of-house servers and managers there to facilitate your party."

"We sell parties typically for between eight and 20 guests," Vogelhut said. "It includes two hours of bowling and the shoe rental, and we have different food packages to go with it."

There are three levels of packages, with the highest one including customized invitations, glow necklaces and a signable bowling pin on top of its extended food menu.

Vogelhut considers Lucky Strike Lanes to be an upscale bowling lounge. "It's a comfy bowling alley," she said. "It's not your standard one with plastic seats. We serve the food as they bowl, so it's a relaxed and comfortable setting."

For parties of 30 people, Lucky Strike also has a VIP lounge, separated from the rest of the facility by a floor-to-ceiling red velvet curtain.

"There's a lot of versatility with our space," Vogelhut said. "We have pool tables back there, you can do karaoke parties in there, or we can bring in something at your request."

Vogelhut has previously brought in everything from a digital photo booth to a cotton candy machine for parties in the VIP area.

Starting this month, Lucky Strike Lanes will also be offering loot bags, with a free game of bowling included in each bag.

One couple who know a thing or two about the loot bag business are David and Teri Leese, the creators of Loots.

The original loot bag people in Toronto created Loots Lounge (416-787-5668, lootslounge.com) around five years ago as a kids and teens "night club," the first of its kind in this city.

"It's basically a bar mitzvah in a bottle," said David Leese.

Loots Lounge
Kosher catering available

"We package the whole bar mitzvah feel. It's essentially a dance party."

Located on Bayview Avenue, just south of Eglinton Avenue, their primary business is the bar and bat mitzvah crowd, filling up close to 50 nights a year with them. They also throw sweet sixteens and graduation parties along with birthdays.

"Our primary business is teenage parties," Leese said. "But we still do birthday parties, because they're a lot of fun."

They're simple too, because Loots Lounge does all the work. "It's all-inclusive, meaning that we do all of the work for the parents," Leese said. "It's a great time-saving convenience. You just show up and enjoy the festivities."

Working with Magen Boys Entertainment, there is plenty to keep the kids engaged, such as limbo, dancing musical chairs and a bubble wrap pop-off, depending on the age group involved.

"It's all interactive play," Leese said. "It's non-stop activity."

Since Loots is a bar and bat mitzvah venue, you usually have to book early, but sometimes you get a booking on short notice.

"Some people book a year ahead and some a month ahead," Leese said. "The sooner you book, the better chance you have, but we do get last-minute bookings as well."

A bowling alley requires less notice, but giving some wouldn't hurt.

"Sometimes people will book on Wednesday for the weekend," Vogelhut said. "We prefer a four-week window, but if it fits, we'll take it and make it work."

Live bands can give energy to the wedding party

By STEPHEN SWEET
Special to The CJN

A wedding party is a great event to enjoy, and the right band can make the night complete.

Ascension Groove (416-509-3863) and Joe Star Band (905-881-1378) are just two of the live ensembles out there that perform weddings, and both love to keep people moving.

Joe Palawan, keyboard player, vocalist and band leader for Ascension Groove, believes that a live band is best at a wedding.

"When you have music performed live by great musicians, it will sound different and unique, but will still come out as good as the original version."

He says it looks better, too.

"I think it's also a visual thing, seeing a band playing the music," Palawan said. "It motivates people to get out on the dance floor."

Joe Star, who has led his group since 1989 and has been playing functions for 40 years, feels that the energy created by a live band makes the difference.

"It's the same thing as when you go to a club," Star said. "Do you want to see and feel the music being played, or watch a guy play his records?"

Palawan has found the former to be true at the simchahs he's worked at.

Ascension Groove

"From what I've seen at Jewish weddings, people like to see talent on stage," Palawan said. "They like to see good bands and good singers."

And as performers, it's up to bands to keep the energy level high.

"As we play, we deliver the type and pace of music that the audience projects back to us," Star said.

"This determines the style we play in order to keep the energy going on the dance floor."

Figuring out what the audience wants to hear is a big part of being a wedding musician.

"You pretty much have to play off the crowd," Palawan said. "Sometimes you keep it high, and sometimes you keep it mellow, depending on what kind of an evening it is."

In order for these artists to appeal to all crowds, they must have a variety of musical styles that they feel comfortable playing.

"We have travelled a lot and have picked up a lot of different types of music," said Palawan, who has performed on four different continents, as well as in international waters on cruise ships.

This allows the band to cater to various kinds of events.

"We have a set format to start the evening," Star said. "But from there, we'll change things up depending on the crowd and age majority there."

Save for a few current hits and some classics, the choice of music at weddings is rarely the same.

"Every wedding is different," Palawan said. "There's a lot more variety out there than there used to be. We hardly have any of the same songs go from set to set anymore.

"Everyone has a different idea of the wedding song that they want."

Having a live band experience doesn't necessarily mean running up the budget.

"We cater to the size of the event," Palawan said. "We do have a minimum charge that we usually go by, but if it's a smaller wedding on a tight budget, we do sometimes give them a special lower price."

Star feels that budgeting for a band is worth the investment.

"You can have a live band on any budget if you use your money accordingly," he said. "You get what you pay for and everything, within reason, is negotiable."

Making your simchah a night to remember

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

A memorable simchah deserves to be remembered, and what better way is there than with a video of the celebration?

DMS Video Productions and Lisa Productions are two companies that specialize in capturing the event.

DMS Video Productions (905-738-5510, info@dmsvideo.com) has been in the business for 25 years. Owner Darren Sager said it began with a passion for video.

"I loved shooting [videos] and editing, and it just naturally led in from hobby to career," he said.

The company offers "a level of service that's really not matched anywhere else in the Jewish community," he said.

The company is a full broadcast house with professional-level cameras on par with large TV companies, he said. It also has plasma and large screens available for rental.

In additional to traditional documentary format videos, he offers cinematic captures, which he explained as seeing the event in a more entertaining fashion, rather than watching everything unfold in real time.

When clients hire the company, they can be sure that all of the services will be performed by their employees, he said, explaining that other videographers sometimes subcontract employees from external businesses. Therefore, a client might interview two companies, choose the first, and find the latter at the party completing a service for the first company.

"If we don't have the people to shoot the event, we simply don't do it," he said. "Our customer satisfaction is just too important to us."

Lisa Productions (905-764-1033, lisaproductions@hotmail.com) is another videography business that has been in the industry for more than 20 years.

Lisa Feinstein, the owner of Lisa Productions, said what makes her company unique is the close relationships she forms with her clients.

"If my clients don't know me, they like to meet me," she said, explaining that clients will often see her work and discuss their goals so she can use her experience to offer suggestions to enhance the event.

Her clients have mostly heard of her through word-of-mouth, she said, a testament to her close relationships with her clients.

"That's the best type of advertising," she said. "My clients are incredibly wonderful people so I'm truly, truly lucky."

She has years of experience working in the film and television production industry, having worked for companies such as CBC, she said.

Her editors work with the latest technology, she said, adding that they are able to produce anything from a straight documentary-style video to a snazzy one with all the bells and whistles.

She said the videos display the true atmosphere of the event, thanks to her unobtrusive style.

"The focus should be on the event, not on the videographer," she said.

About five years ago, her son, Matt, joined her in the company. She said his presence brings a fresh face to the business, along with his experience as a world traveller, which has given him excellent people skills.

She said she offers a range of reasonable rates and is able to work within tight budgets, especially in tough economic times.

Both of these companies offer to make tributes and slide shows, as well as live eye, which shows a live capture of the event on screen.

Try Thai and Chinese delights at C'est Bon

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If you're looking for an elegant location to hold a small party or a corporate lunch, consider C'est Bon (416-849-2214), a casual/ fine dining restaurant specializing in Chinese and Thai cuisine at 2140 Yonge St., near Eglinton Avenue.

In the summer, the backyard patio, which seats 30, is a popular setting for parties such as wedding showers, birthdays and corporate events, says co-owner Steven Chen. "It's gorgeous and very private."

There is also a patio on the street-side of the restaurant, Chen says. "In the summer our seating capacity doubles."

The restaurant, which can accommodate about 40 for a sit-down dinner, also does catering, he adds.

C'est Bon has opened a second location at 2685 Yonge St., near Blythwood Avenue (416-932-2811), which is well suited to family and casual dining, Chen says.

The sweet and spicy Szechuan dishes such as General Tsao Chicken, and Crispy Ginger Beef are the restaurants' most popular items. General Tsao Chicken is a breaded chicken breast in a sweet and sour sauce with a "spicy kick," while Ginger Beef is sliced beef in a "thick gingery- spiced soy sauce."

C'est Bon also offers a " huge selection" of tofu dishes, says Chen. "All of our popular meat and chicken dishes can be adapted for vegetarians. We substitute tofu for the meat."

General Tsao Tofu is a "great hit," with vegetarians, he notes. "We often see members of the same family ordering both versions of the dish."

Another one of C'est Bon's best-sellers is Taiwanese Basil Chicken, which should not be confused with the spicy Thai dish with the same name, Chen says. "This is a chicken dish made with whole garlic and sliced ginger stewed in a sweet soy sauce. It's not spicy at all."

Other popular items include Lemon Chicken, Sweet and Sour Chicken Balls, and of course, spring rolls.

C'est Bon, which is open 365 days a year, also offers dim sum and Thai dishes such as Pad Thai, Mango Chicken, Mango Salad and Yellow Curry Chicken.

When Chen and his mother purchased the restaurant nine years ago, it was a "greasy spoon with fish and chips and a little bit of everything on the menu," recalls Chen.

Non-Kosher
Capacity under 100

He also renamed the restaurant. "I used to live in France. C'est bon, means 'It's good.'"

One popular item on the menu at C'est Bon's southern location, which remains from its fish and chip days, is the Fried Mars Bar.

"We introduced the Fried Mars Bar to Toronto," says Chen. "It's a popular dessert at Scottish fish and chip shops. In Scotland, they fry everything.

"A friend of mine from Scotland persuaded me to do the dessert in Toronto. People from all over came to try it. We had people coming from Montreal and Ottawa. They had heard about it."

For the ultimate indulgence, he recommends Fried Mars Bar a la Mode.

Chen says they have now perfected the Mars bar recipe. "We changed the batter, so it's not greasy. When you taste it, you would think it was baked."

Party planners turn dreams into reality

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

They are personable, organized and composed. They can negotiate, mediate and turn dreams into reality. They are consultants, also known as event and party planners, and their services will enhance any special occasion.

When it comes to weddings, no matter how big or small, the details can be overwhelming. There is the venue to be booked, the photographer to be contacted, the flowers to be chosen and the catering to be arranged (and the list continues). In order to minimize the stress and maximize the excitement of the planning process, couples are advised to hire a consultant – a professional spokesperson for the bride and groom.

Everyone should be treated like a celebrity

Sandra Aaron of Mindless Sophistication (416-251-3278) and Risa Gold of Risa Gold & Associates (905-886-1233) are two consultants who have reputations for creating memorable and unique experiences for their clients.

Risa Gold, who started working in the field 20 years ago, says she gets "a great sense of satisfaction" in helping couples plan "the first day of the rest of their lives." Motivated by her husband, Isaac, founder of wedding band Nu-Rhythm, Gold became a consultant to have her own role in the "industry of simchahs."

Gold spent the first 10 years of her career as an independent consultant, but in 2001 she decided to expand her services. She joined forces with Mery Bendayan, Miriam Rotman and Lisa Oziel, and called her new firm Risa Gold & Associates. Since weddings are her specialty, Gold has many tips for newly engaged couples. She says it's never too early to decide on the date, shop around for the venue and secure the vendors. Once finalized, the couple can relax and work on the details with their consultant at a more leisurely pace. Her advice for the planning process includes her "Five C's" principle, which applies to the bride, groom and their family members: communication, consideration, courtesy, compromise and compliment.

Today, Gold says her company's "full wedding service" is their most sought-after package, although the "partial service" is also in high demand. "The partial service is more elaborate than a day-of service, yet it gears to the clients that don't need as much guidance and hand-holding as the full service."

In terms of trends, Gold says traditions and customs are still a big part of most weddings, but many couples are interested in having "a simple, relaxing and fun event." As a result, her company is seeing "smaller bridal parties [if any], no wedding cake, shorter speeches and less formalities, and dinners consisting of buffets and stations. Good food, good music and good friends are now the priority."

One of Gold's favourite projects was planning the high-profile wedding of Trish Stratus, a professional wrestler and actor, which was captured on film by MTV and Entertainment Tonight. "The wedding was amazing, most of the famous wrestlers were in attendance, and I got my 15 seconds of fame when I appeared on the MTV Wedding Special," she says.

Sandra Aaron of Mindless Sophistication believes that everyone deserves to be treated like a celebrity, especially on her wedding day. She enjoys top quality and insists that all brides and grooms receive the same level of service that she would want for herself. Aaron says the term "Mindless Sophistication" is more than a business name; it's a state of mind.

"People who have mindless sophistication aren't trying to impress anyone. They have the confidence to follow their own path and really enjoy life without worrying about what others think. It's the perfect name for my business because weddings and events really are about enjoyment. There are some traditional rules, but there is also this great purity about being able to express the individuality of the hosts," she says.

Planners can help with destination weddings

Because most people want to plan their own wedding, Aaron says it's the day of co-ordination and consulting services that are usually requested. "With the day of co-ordination, I work with the couple for about a month before the wedding, catching up on everything they have planned, so that on the day, I can be there to make sure everything is how they want it. With consulting, I'm there when people are just beginning the process and don't know where to start."

Destination wedding planning is another popular service that Aaron offers her clients. Whether at an island resort or a cabin in the woods, she can help create a unique travel experience that is custom-made for each couple. "The Wandering Jew Wedding Package" is a service for couples getting married abroad who want to incorporate Jewish traditions into their special day, she says.

Mindless Sophistication is also proud to offer a "Wedding Concierge" service, says Aaron. The specially trained concierges, or "wish-makers," can assist out-of-town guests "with the little things that will make their stay more pleasurable." They can arrange theatre tickets, transportation, dinner reservations and tours, and even help with the purchase of a last-minute wedding gift.

Aaron says she is still waiting to find out which wedding trends take hold this season. The candy buffet and cupcakes have been popular in the past, but are slowly being phased out. Sushi, comfort food as appetizers, cheesecake lollipops, cookie bars and mini pies are all making appearances, she says.

"I'm also seeing people being a little more adventurous about their centrepieces. It's not all about floral anymore. Lanterns are popular, people love using branches, and bling is everywhere. Couples also seem to like illumination. I don't remember the last wedding I attended or worked on that didn't have candles. Also having a theme is in. It's not enough to have wedding colours. Alice in Wonderland is already a big theme for this year."

Aaron's advice for couples in the planning stage is practical and priceless: relax and enjoy the process. "The industry sells weddings as a day that has to be perfect. It doesn't, because there is often perfection within the imperfections." She says determining a budget before making any decisions is key, as "nobody should go into debt before their wedding. If something is going to make their married life harder because it costs too much, it's really not worth it."

Aside from weddings, Aaron has also planned birthday parties, charity events, corporate meetings, tea parties and receptions. For more information on Mindless Sophistication, visit the website at http://www.mindlesssophistication.com.

Gift shop path to Jewish life

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The Israeli Source is more than a gift shop. It's a gateway to a Jewish life.

The store, located at 60 Doncaster Ave, Unit 1, in Thornhill, is stocked with unique gifts, from menorahs and seder plates to candlesticks, tzedakah boxes, kiddush cups and a variety of religious books.

"The owners [Barbara and Chuck Elnekave] grew up in Toronto's community and they saw that being Jewish provides challenges," said store manager Yehuda Aboudi. "There's no need to make Jewish living so expensive. With their passion for Jewish books and gifts… they created the Israeli Source."

The store, which opened in February 2006, caters not just to the everyday shopper, but also to party-goers and planners.

"We have all the Jewish articles people need for different times of the year and different life cycle periods, like bar mitzvahs, weddings, different holidays – all the stuff that people need for living a Jewish life," Aboudi said.

Popular gifts for bar and bat mitzvahs, according to Aboudi, include kiddush cups, menorah, candlesticks, torah pointers and book sets.

"They would get books… that they wouldn't use right now, but in the future, books about different laws for Jewish living, as well as books about great Jews in history," he said.

The Israeli Source also has a collection specifically for weddings, which includes wedding glass mezuzahs, kiddush cups and candlesticks.

The majority of the store's merchandise is handmade by artists, many of whom are Israeli, although some are from America and Canada. Some popular Israeli artists include Yair Emanuel, Adi Sidler and Ronit Akavia, Aboudi said.

"What I find is that people prefer to give the stuff from Israel, the artwork from Israel. It makes a connection between them to the Land of Israel," he said.

For Aboudi, it's not just the merchandise that sets the Israeli Source apart.

"First of all, the Israeli Source is a more affordable way when shopping if you're looking to get Jewish gifts or items," he said. "Also, our staff is very knowledgeable. [We have] very nice staff that are there to go out and help when customers come in."

Apart from wedding and bar or bat mitzvah gifts, the store also has a collection of Jewish-themed toys, which include puzzles, place mats, stickers and plush toys.

Hard Rock Café offers rock 'n' roll ambience

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There's nothing like a party that rocks. And for the last four years the ultimate rocking venue for bar and bat mitzvahs has been the Hard Rock Café (416-362-3636), located in the heart of downtown Toronto at Yonge and Dundas streets.

The storied Hard Rock Café, which is known for its rock 'n' roll ambience, revels in music history. The international chain has 131 restaurants in 52 countries, but "no two restaurants are the same," says Marcelo DeOliveira (marcelo_deoliveira@hardrock.com), sales and marketing manager of the Toronto Hard Rock Café.

"Each restaurant has different memorabilia from rock 'n' roll history, which makes each restaurant unique."

He notes that the Toronto Hard Rock Café is the chain's second-oldest restaurant. "We've been at the same location for 32 years."

The original flagship restaurant is in London, England.

Parties and events at the Toronto location are held in a second-floor multi-functional room that can be used for corporate events or as a private party room or nightclub, says DeOliveira, adding that the room has a private entrance and is wheel-chair accessible.

He notes that there is a stage as well as audiovisual, sound and lighting equipment, which is convenient for the client and can be cost-saving.

The capacity for a sit-down dinner with a dance-floor area is 70 to 150 people, but the room can accommodate as many as 300 people for a standup cocktail reception.

"We do a lot of corporate events for the parents who hold bar mitzvahs here."

The restaurant has a themed décor built around music, he says. "There's no need to go crazy with decorations for an event here."

The private party room overlooks Dundas Square, which is sometimes referred to as "Canada's Times Square," and this is a bonus for Hard Rock Café clients, says DeOliveira. He explains that the excitement and energy generated by public events and concerts held in the square often add to the ambience of parties at the Hard Rock Café because guests get a full view of the outdoor event.

There are no set menu packages. People can mix and match various items to customize their meals, says DeOliveira. "We can do anything. We have very talented people working in the kitchen."

Most people choose buffet dinners for the bar or bat mitzvahs, with different buffet choices for adults and children, says DeOliveira, noting that two different buffet tables makes the most sense because most children do not enjoy the more gourmet adult fare.

- Fully Kosher Facility
- Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- Kosher Event Catering Available
- Capacity up to 100 People
- 100-300 Person Capacity
- Over 300 Person Capacity
- Wheelchair Accessible

The events usually begin with such popular appetizers as mini hamburgers on baguettes, vegetarian California rolls, potato-skin bruschetta or smoked salmon on English cucumbers, says DeOliveira. "We try to offer a lot of healthy options to our customers. The lighter food is for the adults. They don't want to be inundated with greasy food."

Other popular appetizers include jumbo soft pretzels with a three-mustard dip and a Mediterranean dip station with hummus and baba ghanoush.

Choices for the children's buffet include caesar or Greek salad, sweet potato and/or regular fries, fish and chips, pasta with tomato sauce, chicken tenders and plum sauce and twisted macaroni and cheese.

Adults can choose from such gourmet fare as beef tenderloin, poached wild Alaskan salmon and grilled chicken supreme. Their meals would include caesar or house salad, vegetable and a side dish such as risotto.

The family is also invited to taste the meals they've ordered, he says. "Sometimes something on paper sounds great, but it's not what the family had in mind. The meal tastings gives them an opportunity to make adjustments.

"Not all families takes us up on this offer, but the ones that do find it useful."

Dessert at a Hard Rock event is served at about 10 p.m. so a sweet table is not necessary, says DeOliveira.

For adults, he recommends plated desserts like the dark chocolate mousse topped with Grand Marnier and Kahlua, a decadent treat made on the premises.

Mirvish gift cards make for a good time

By STEPHEN SWEET
Special to The CJN

Looking for a gift idea that has flexibility and fun written all over it? Then a Mirvish gift certificate just might fit the bill.

The certificates can be purchased online or over the phone, and are available for any denomination.

"People can buy the gift certificates for use at any of our theatres," said Mirvish's John Karastamatis. This means that they're valid for productions at the Royal Alexandra Theatre, the Canon Theatre, the Princess of Wales Theatre and the Panasonic Theatre.

Buying a gift card instead of a specific item can be a good idea, especially when a couple has a lot of products they already need.

"These days, we live in a society that seems to be maxed out, at least in terms of consumer goods," Karastamatis said.

"What many people do want is to have new experiences and to be entertained, and to look at the world in a different way. Theatre certainly does that for almost everybody."

Additionally, the idea of a certificate rather than specific tickets allows for a better chance of getting the gift right.

"It's hard to judge someone else's taste, especially when it comes to entertainment," Karastamatis said. "The gift card gives total flexibility, so people can decide what and when they want to attend."

The only time that the gift certificate can't be used is for a show that is already sold out.

But even with that possibility, there are always plenty of options available.

"We present somewhere between 20 and 30 shows a year, so there's always lots of choice," Karastamatis said.

The upcoming season subscription of shows provides a sextet of productions, both local and international.

Priscilla, Queen of the Desert, is a stage adaptation of the 1994 Australian film, and it has already had successful runs in Sydney and London.

Billy Elliot the Musical is set to run in Toronto for February, 2011. The play, which won 10 Tony Awards last year, is also based on an original movie, and has been showing on Broadway, as well as in London, Sydney and Melbourne, Australia.

"Those are two really big shows coming up, in terms of their stature and size," Karastamatis said. "They've been successful all over, and they are very eagerly awaited here in Toronto."

Also included in the subscription are A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum, courtesy of the Stratford Festival, The Secret Garden, which is based on the original novel, Neil Simon's Sweet Charity and Calendar Girls, another movie adaptation.

Arriving sooner than any of those plays is Ireland's How Now Mrs. Brown Cow, a radio show that was adapted into stage plays in Dublin. The performances have been wildly successful in the United Kingdom, and Karastamatis expects the play to do just as well here.

"It's a hilarious comedy about a working-class family in Dublin," he said. "We think it will become an international phenomenon."

All of Mirvish's confirmed plays and current shows can be found on its website at www.mirvish.com.

"We're in the business of providing quality live entertainment," Karastamatis said. "No matter what type of play you are into, we have shows that appeal to almost everybody."

Venues customized to partying needs

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Live tigers, fire breathers, contortionists and zero-gravity circus acts. Nothing is impossible at Berkeley Heritage events.

"I think we have a different kind of philosophy where it's very customizable," said Andrew Smith of the Berkeley. "We don't have a package. I want to learn what you want. Do you love Mexican mariachi bands? I'm calling you one. You want a tiger? Give me six hours. There's nothing that we can't make in a call happen."

The Berkeley is made up of two venues – a church and a field house. The church, built in 1871, is a heritage Canada landmark. It was built for the Wesley Methodists and was used as a church until 1950, when the United Church took it over and turned it into a film studio. In 1996, the building was purchased by Berkeley. It was opened as a venue in 2000, complete with 40-foot ceilings and 139-year-old floors.

"Whenever a new person walks in, their eyes light up. I think the contrast is amazing, the juxtaposition of old and new together," Smith said, adding that the venue, which can seat 380 people, includes an old choir box and an original plaque with the names of all the church parishioners who didn't make it back from World War I.

The field house, which used to be an old lumber yard, can seat 150 people.

The Berkeley has often been the scene of lavish private parties and secret concerts.

"We've had Sloan, Feist, Finger Eleven. Coldplay did a photo shoot there," Smith said. "We have anything from weddings, corporate events, concerts, fashion shows during fashion week, film fest parties."

It also hosts several bar and bat mitzvahs a year.

Far from being just a venue, the Berkeley provides everything from entertainment to catering.

Because of the church's high ceilings, it's an ideal entertainment venue, which works well for parties.

"We have some of the best acoustics anywhere. When bands come in, they always love it," Smith said.

Apart from acoustics, the church's high ceilings make it ideal for a variety of themes. Some past bar and bat mitzvah themes included the circus, where trapeze acts could swing from the ceilings.

"We've had concert themes, where the young man was an accomplished musician, a Fiddler on the Roof theme, a zero-gravity circus act," Smith said.

"We want to stress that we're not a typical place. We are the Berkeley. We call it the Berkeley experience."

The Berkeley is located at 315 Queen St. E. For more information, visit www.berkeleyevents.com, or call 416-361-9666.

For a setting that's a little bit more intimate, party planners can visit Pantages Hotel. The 3,500-square-foot ballroom at Pantages is divided into three rooms, which seat about 225 people altogether.

"It's not in a larger hotel where [the customer] would be one of many bookings," said Carrie Alexander, the director of sales at Pantages. "The ballroom would be theirs."

The venue, located in the heart of downtown Toronto, across the street from the Eaton Centre, has high ceilings, muted zebra-striped carpets and a built-in audio-visual system.

"It's quite contemporary in style," Alexander said, adding that the Pantages also provides catering with flexible menus.

"Our chef is very hands on. He can customize something. [The customer] gets more personalized attention," she said. "You're not lost among many groups. It makes the client feel special."

New names, familiar faces at kosher caterers

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

When it comes to kosher catering, two of the newer kids on the block are actually not so new – they're well-known faces in the community, pushing the boundaries and taking on new challenges to meet all your event needs, on any budget.

For 15 years, Ely's Fine Foods (416-782-3231; http://www.elysfinefoods.com/) has been a fixture on Bathurst Street, offering tasty takeout food that gathered rave reviews since it opened. But according to Manny Azulay, the son of Ely (it's pronounced Ee-lie), for whom the store is named, "people want [our food] not just on their Shabbat table… they want us as part of their simchahs."

Now, Ely's Signature Events has been named exclusive caterer to Bnei Torah Congregation. This new division of Ely's Fine Foods was created to extend Ely's capabilities and take the pressure off hosts eager to combine Ely's tradition of delicious kosher food with detailed, full-service catering.

"We're looking forward to bringing the same type of innovation, quality and affordability that we've been bringing to the catering market for the last 15 years," says Azulay. Bnei Torah's hall offers a capacity of up to 250 people.

Not that the company hasn't catered simchahs, large and small, throughout its history. "You can walk into the store at any given time and pick from over 200 items," says Azulay. There's also an online menu, giving hosts the ability to plan their own custom menu in the comfort of their home. And as with the retail location, Ely's offers the flexibility to match any price point.

In case you've already decided Ely's is all about Chinese takeout, a quick glimpse at the menu reveals everything from takeout Shabbat dishes, sushi and a "Healthy for You" line developed in conjunction with a specialty chef.

Flexibility has always been key to Ely's success; choose a few dishes or an entire feast – it's up to you. "Some people come in just for the chicken fingers," says Azulay. For others, it's a complete supper, or platters for a corporate event, from soup to appetizers, side salads, kugels and knishes, stuffed chicken breast, fish or brisket, and finishing the meal off with a refreshing fresh-fruit platter.

Through Ely's Signature Events, Azulay is leveraging his family's 50-year food tradition – first in Morocco and then in Montreal – to create Toronto simchahs with a "European flair." Through family contacts there, Ely's can offer many Montreal-style selections available, including sweet-table choices and hors d'oeuvres. "They can't be found anywhere… you'd have to come for an event to be able to enjoy them here."

Most important, Azulay believes the new catering venture must build on the reputation that Ely's has already created, "making sure anything we attach our name does have the quality that people have come to expect."

PR Creative Caterers (416-787-9889; http://www.prcreativecaterers.com/) represents two Torontonians who also come from "food families," venturing into a relatively new business, though this one has been around for about five years. Partners Joe Elmaleh, whose family owns King Solomon's Table, and Israel Fisch, a grandson of the founders of Perl's Meats, teamed up five years ago to create a different kind of company, specializing in high-quality food, presentation and service.

"We are the exclusive kosher caterers to the Fairmont Royal York Hotel," says Elmaleh. That says something about the quality of the food, as does the fact that one specialty has become sending plated meals to hotels and non-kosher fine-dining restaurants throughout the city.

From a full tasting once a party has been booked to having at least one of the principals on-site throughout the simchah, PR Creative Caterers aims to take care of your needs from start to finish.

Beyond the Fairmont Royal York, PR Creative Caterers caters events at venues such as the Paramount, Hilton Garden Inn, Sutton Place and the Intercontinental, plus Sheraton Parkway and Downtown. Catering organizational events, such as business meetings and conferences, has brought PR's food to new markets beyond traditional kosher simchahs and the reviews, Elmaleh says, have been overwhelmingly positive.

"We have a phenomenal team, starting from the kitchen." Because most of PR's venues don't have an on-site kosher kitchen, the bulk of the preparation work takes place in the company's large main kitchen on Chesswood Drive. However, beyond ingredient preparation, everything else takes place on-site, at the venue itself. "All the meals are finalized at the site… that's the only way that they'll taste good. If you reheat something, it won't taste as good."

No kosher kitchen? No problem for PR. "We recently did a function at the Fairmont Royal York for more than 1,000 people – without stepping foot in their kitchen." Instead, a banquet hall was used to set up a "satellite kitchen," complete with ovens and stoves: "Everything from A to Z," Elmaleh says.

That means all food is hot and fresh – and plated in the kitchen itself before anyone sees it. "We pride ourselves on doing plated service. That way, all the meals come out exactly the same way."

When you've worked hard on creating a perfect dish, you want it to look exactly right, Elmalah says.

"A lot of detail goes into how it's presented on the plate. We try to co-ordinate colours of the foods. One of our most famous dishes is a trio plate… the chef makes sure it's appealing to the eye before they actually taste it. It could be salmon or sea bass, a small fennel salad, soup shooter in a shooter glass."

"As the servers are bringing the food… [guests] should basically be able to say, 'Wow, that looks great.' When they taste it, they'll feel the same way."

Celebrating bar/bat mitzvahs in Israel

By JENNIFER LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

A child's bar or bat mitzvah is one of the most important days of her or her life – and many families are now choosing to commemorate this special occasion in Israel.

Two Toronto-based travel agencies are experts when it comes to travelling in Israel, and both of them offer all-inclusive tours for families looking to celebrate their bar and bat mizvahs in the Holy Land.

Aufgang Travel and Cruise Centre (416-789-7117, www.aufgangtravel.com) is one of the oldest travel agencies in Toronto. Founded in 1949, Aufgang Travel has established a reputation for providing high-quality service to the discriminating traveller. "We have a long tradition of being experts on travel to Israel," says Avi Rodak, vice-president of Aufgang Travel. "It is our top priority that people have the most positive experience."

The Aufgang Travel bar mitzvah tour is two weeks long, and families are assigned to a bus of up to 30 people. The group spends the whole trip together and gets an extensive tour of the country. "Highlights include touring the Old City, shopping in Tel Aviv, water-rafting on the Jordan river and swimming in the Dead Sea," says Rodak. On one of the days of the trip, a bar mitzvah ceremony takes place at the Southern Wall. "For the price of a party, families can choose to have two weeks of fun and adventure," says Rodak.

Families preferring to travel on their own can choose to customize their trip to their budget. "We know the sights first-hand," says Rodak. "We go to Israel every year to see the hotels, restaurants and attractions we recommended. This means we can send our clients to the newest and most up to date destinations."

> Two weeks of fun and adventure

Peerless Travel (905-886-5610, www.israelfamilytours.com) also specializes in family bar and bat mitzvah tours to Israel. Peerless Travel was established in 1990 and is now one of Canada's largest travel agencies.

"We send about 1,000 people a year to Israel," says Ehud Telem of Peerless Travel. "The family bar and bat mitzvah trip is the best tour in North America. It has all the highlights and all the bells and whistles. Alumni of our trips are our main form of advertising."

Telm recommends the family tour for families going to Israel to celebrate a bar or bat mitzvah because travelling as a group is more efficient than as individuals. "This way we can take advantage of group specials and see more attractions than a family could on their own." Travelling as a group also creates a community between the different families. "People make connections with each other, and that can really make it a different experience," Telem adds.

Telem encourages travellers to book with Peerless Travel rather than an online travel website, because without a travel agent, people will not have the support and expertise required to have a successful trip. "Travel seems simple, but there are a lot of things to learn and know," says Telem. "We are the experts and think of the things the average traveller will not. I have seen many Internet casualties – they will book a trip online and their flight will be cancelled or their insurance won't cover their needs. This will never happen to someone who seeks our advice."

Family bar and bat mitzvahs tours depart four times each year, during spring, summer and winter vacations as well as during Passover. Highlights of the trip include spending Shabbat in Jerusalem, climbing Masada and visiting a Druze village.

REVOLUTIONIZING THE PARTY INDUSTRY ONE EVENT AT A TIME! ™

Let the Magen Boys customize your event

By JENNIFER LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

Magen Boys Entertainment, founded by brothers Jian and Page Magen (905-513-6464), has been an industry leader in providing entertainment for bar mitzvahs, weddings and other events for the last 10 years.

"Our passion for every party is second to none" Jian says. "We feel incredibly lucky to be part of this industry."

Magen Boys Entertainment stands out from other entertainment companies because of its ability to customize each event. "Every client has a unique identity, so no two parties are ever the same. We press refresh on every event, so no one has to go to the same party twice" says Jian.

"We are challenged by our audience, and we are always trying new technology to make our services even better than they already are."

Magen Boys was the first entertainment company in Canada to have a music video turntable – a party with a live DJ who plays music videos. "We are always pushing the envelope with innovation."

Jian and Page Magen

Partygoers can expect the highest quality entertainment because Magen Boys Entertainment employs some of the most talented people in North America. "We really are separated by our talent pool of over 200 people. We work with the newest dance troupes from So You Think You Can Dance, Blue Jays and Raptors players, and Canadian Idol contestants – you name it and we can make it happen" says Page. "Everyone from our MCs to our live bands and dancers are professionally trained and the best at what they do. Every weekend is something new."

"Anyone can call themselves an entertainment company" Page says, "but we have stood the test of time."

Magen Boys Entertainment can throw multiple events in one evening in cities across Canada, including Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax. "We are not a one-man show, and this gives us the ability to reinvent ourselves again and again."

Magen Boys Entertainment also works with clients to plan events of any size, from simple to extravagant. "We excel at working within people's budgets," Jian says. "In hard economic times, not everyone has an endless budget, but they still want to throw a beautiful party. What they spend means nothing to us – sometimes less can be more."

"We make every attempt to bring Jewish themes to our events" says Page. "Our dancers can lead traditional Israeli dancing, and we have a large library of Hebrew songs. We want to give clients a full-fledged Jewish experience."

The Magen brothers not only want to set an example in the world of entertainment, they also want to be role models in the Jewish community. "As leaders in the industry, kids look up to us and we have values to uphold" Jian says, noting that the brothers lead a group of walkers every year in the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's annual Walk With Israel.

"We need to be a positive image in the Jewish community. This is what we live for."

Magen Boys Entertainment will be moving from its Markham location to a new state-of-the-art office in Thornhill later this year.

For unique rentals to make your next simchah one that will not soon be forgotten, make The Playdium Store (416-251-2122, www.theplaydiumstore.com) the first stop on your list.

The Playdium Store is owned by Starburst Coin Machines, established in 1975. Today it's one of Canada's largest distributors and operators of coin-operated amusement machines. In 2008, The Playdium Store showroom was opened in Toronto at 70 Ronson Dr. (near Martin Grove and Dixon roads).

Items available for rent at The Playdium Store include everything from air hockey tables to jukeboxes, driving games to photo booths and dance machines.

The wide range of rental items available is one of the reasons customers should come to The Playdium Store, says chief operating officer Gary Walters.

"We have an extremely large variety and volume [available]," Walters says. "We're the best in terms of quantity, quality and variety in Canada."

One of the first things The Playdium Store recommends is a site visit to the venue where your event is being held in order to ensure the games can be set up properly. Everything is then delivered and set up the day of your party and taken away after. Another perk to renting through The Playdium Store is the 24-hour technical service it offers – someone will come to the venue immediately if there are problems with the equipment.

With daily and weekly rentals available for bar and bat mitzvahs, conventions, trade shows and any other major event, plus reasonable prices and great service, a visit to The Playdium Store ensures a stress-free and fun time will be had by all.

If what you're looking for is a way to add some colour to your next event, Around the Table (416-630-6704, www.aroundthetable.ca) is a great place to make this happen.

Around the Table rents linens in every colour, style, texture and shape imaginable. The company's employees always stay on top of trends and make frequent trips to Europe, says owner Debbie Farkas.

Farkas, who started out in the industry selling paper plates and napkins out of her house, says one of Around the Table's strengths, other than staying on top of fashion trends, is the attention to detail and focus on quality in the products she carries.

One of the job requirements at Around the Table is being familiar with every venue in Toronto. Every sales representative, Farkas included, visits venues throughout the city at least once a year. They also provide samples for clients to bring with to their venues and work with every florist in the city. This means they're able to customize table settings and décor based on the different styles of florists.

At Around the Table, the sales reps are also familiar with the table sizes at most every venue. "We have a lot of knowledge," Farkas says. "We do everything short of bringing in the appetizers."

Farkas, who recommends customers come to Around the Table four or five months in advance, says she's also able to accommodate people on tight budgets. With tablecloths starting at $12-$14 each, and going up to $35, there is something for every price point and design preference. Around the Table can also custom-make linens.

"[We are] very service oriented," she said. "We will do anything to accommodate the client. We will make the venue look gorgeous.

"We're easy to work with. You can make revisions literally the morning of, and if we have the linen in stock, we will accommodate [you]."

Photographer should give you good vibes

STEPHEN SWEET
Special to The CJN

On your wedding day, most of your time will be spent with two very important people – your soon-to-be spouse and your photographer.

And you have to get along with both.

Karl Anderson, a photographer at StudioTwentyFive (416-260-2746, studiotwentyfive.ca), considers mutual understanding to be crucial for a photographer and marrying couple.

"You have to spend your entire wedding day with this person, so you want to know that it's someone who you can get along with," Anderson said.

"It needs to be someone who is not going to stress you out and a person who you get a good vibe from."

Meeting the photographer in advance is a good way to gauge things, Anderson believes.

"I always recommend that people come in to sit and chat first," he said. "That's the only way you can choose the photographer that's right for you."

Fellow camera jockey Eric Benchimol of Eric Benchimol Photography (416-823-8463, www.ericbenchimol.com) feels that getting along with a person can really make or break your wedding experience.

"The personality of the client has to match the personality of the photographer in order to be successful," Benchimol said.

"At the end of the day, you could see a photographer's amazing work, but if he's unpleasant to work with or has attitude, it could make the day a disaster."

It's up to the photographer to be able to get the right shots without intruding on the festivities.

Eric Benchimol

"That's really the secret of it," Anderson said. "I don't know if there's any simple answer to it. You just have to have respect for the bride and groom on that day.

"Obviously you want to get the best pictures that you can, but not at the cost of anything on their end."

There are ways around it, though.

"Different focal lenses can allow you to get a close shot, even if you can't be there physically," Benchimol said.

Film is a thing of the past, with digital photography being the top option in this business.

"Speed is a big factor in it," said Anderson, who cut his teeth in pro photography under Greg Dean of Signature Studios. "You know right away if you've got the shot or not.

Digital work allows photographers to do more with an individual shot, too.

"The advantage comes in post-production," Benchimol said. "You can manipulate an image to give it so many different kinds of looks, things you'd normally need filters for."

Every wedding is unique, which is one of the challenges Anderson loves about his job.

"No two are the same," he said. "You have a loose plan of what you want to do on that day, but until the day arrives, you never know what's going to happen."

For Benchimol, photography was a love found again during a difficult time in his life.

"I was going through a battle with cancer in 2001," he said. "It was during that time that I re-discovered my passion for photography."

Benchimol got back into things by taking portraits of nieces and nephews before going to school for photography.

"I did jobs with some of Toronto's top photographers over the past few years," he said, "and eventually, I went out on my own."

When it comes to purchasing photos, these guys think outside of the box.

"All of our packages deal with straight buyouts for the clients," Anderson said. "They're based on time coverage, and we provide the images afterward online, so they can go at them at their leisure."

Benchimol found that the a la carte method suits his business better.

"I don't have the traditional packages, because I've found that people inevitably wanted to modify what I was offering," he said.

A Jewish wedding also celebrates continuity

By Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Venue, caterer, dresses and more: the little details paint a perfect picture. But every picture needs a frame – in this case, the ancient Jewish rituals that truly transform the day into a simchah. A Jewish wedding is about more than just two people – it celebrates commitment, community and continuity.

Even the chupah, which symbolizes the couple's home, also represents "openness, on the sides, to the family, friends, community," says Beth Tzedec Congregation's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl.

When the ring is placed on the bride's finger – or, in an egalitarian ceremony, when rings are exchanged – the verses spoken make "a statement about marriage… as a state of holiness," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl says.

The ketubah, "a quintessential Jewish document," underscores the marriage as "more than simply a personal private relationship of love," taking a relationship and giving it form and substance.

Finally, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl says, the Sheva Brachot (seven marriage blessings) "situate [the couple's] celebration within the larger religious imagination of the Jewish people." One of the blessings proclaims, "May Zion rejoice as her children are restored to her in joy," and they conclude, "Let there soon be heard in… the streets of Jerusalem… the voice of the groom and the voice of the bride."

This redemptive promise, says Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, transforms the chupah once more into "Mount Sinai, the moment of revelation and covenant and commitment."

For Rabbi Ed Elkin of First Narayever Congregation, the Sheva Brachot underscore the difference between a simple legal contract and the higher aspirations of a Jewish marriage. "You wouldn't talk about the Garden of Eden and Mashiach when you're buying a parcel of land… there's so much more going on."

At her Orthodox wedding this past April, Anna Zolkower Sherman and her husband, Mark, called up seven different individuals to chant the blessings. "Mostly, it was rebbeim [rabbis] we're close to as a couple," she says.

Including these rabbis made the ceremony more meaningful. "Everything under the chupah was very emotional. People were crying."

Rabbi Elkin says sometimes he or a cantor will chant the blessings in Hebrew, and then the couple will have friends read them in translation, or share a blessing in English.

The wedding's climax – as any Hollywood director knows – is the breaking of the glass. Yet the significance of the muted crunch is often drowned out by a chorus of mazel tovs and klezmer tunes.

"There are two things going on when a couple gets married," says Rabbi Elkin. "One is very joyful, celebratory, fun… at the same time, it's also a pretty serious step."

The shattered glass symbolizes that "the world is still fragmented and broken in many ways… even though we're happy, not everybody out there is. We hope that one day their lives will be made whole."

For Sherman, the most memorable part of her wedding was the bedeken, a tradition she says "goes back to the time of Yaakov Avinu [the Biblical Jacob], when he was promised to marry Rachel and he got Leah instead." Sherman's husband was danced in with his father, father-in-law, the band and male guests, then put on her veil before heading to the chupah.

Yet even in those intense moments, Sherman turned her focus outward by reciting Tehillim (psalms) for others still desperate for a spouse, for children or otherwise in need of a direct line to heaven. "On your wedding day, your tefillos [prayers] go straight up," she says.

"Recitation of the Tehillim and breaking of the glass are nods towards that more serious side," says Rabbi Elkin. But once the glass is broken, seriousness vanishes as the community celebrates the couple's joy.

Children escort parents to the chupah

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

Lisa Margolese, a single mom with two children, was separated for about 1-1/2 years when through a Jewish dating website she met Gary Finkelstein, a non-practising lawyer who is in real estate development, and who had been separated for just six months and also had two children.

Finkelstein, a Torontonian from birth, and Margolese, a transplant from Montreal, soon discovered that they had more in common than unfortunate first marriages.

"We both love music, travel and movies. We share a sense of humour and a sense of family. We enjoy skiing together, and, of course, food," says Margolese, who is a physiotherapist working on her own.

They met in 2006 and dated for nearly three years before agreeing that theirs was a good match and decided it was time to get engaged. They were wed this past April at Temple Har Zion in Thornhill, Ont. Because the bride and groom are both members of the synagogue, it was very special for them to be married there. As well, all their children attend Hebrew school and services at the temple.

"We knew it was more of a marriage of our families than just a bride and groom, and what better way than to include our children [in the ceremony] as we united our two families," said Margolese, who has a daughter and a son, and Finkelstein, who has two sons.

As second marriages go, the duo, both in their early 40s, recognized that their wedding was more than just their wedding. It was a blending of their two families. Almost simultaneously, the thought came to each of them to ask their children to walk them to the chupah.

Lisa Margolese and Gary Finkelstein pledged their love with the kiddush cup Margolese made.

What a role reversal. Finkelstein's sons, Isaac, 10, and Alec, almost eight, escorted him to the marriage canopy, while Margolese's children, 11-year-old Abby and nine-year-old Benjamin, walked her down the aisle. Other members in the wedding party included Finkelstein's mom, his two brothers, and his sister-in-law, as well as Margolese's mom, step-dad and sister.

The couple, who like things to be meaningful, significant and personal to them, also used a special wine cup for the ceremony from which everyone drank. Margolese, who frequently takes the children to paint various items at a local ceramics shop, noticed goblets at a shop and thought it would be a nice touch to use a personalized, handmade kiddush cup at the wedding ceremony. So she made one, painted blue with a green, yellow and red design.

"It has our wedding date on it [April 18, 2010]," says Margolese, and it is meaningful to the couple because of the love with which it was made.

A marriage ceremony is an important occasion and one that should not be taken lightly, no matter if it's the second time around. It's important to create unique memories for this notable occasion, and Margolese and Finkelstein certainly did just that.

Israelis take part in a rally in the coastal city of Ashkelon showing solidarity with the country's armed forces last Sunday. The government said it has the right to launch its own inquiry into the May 31 raid on the Gaza-bound aid ships. [Flash90 photos]

Israel balks at external flotilla probe

BY BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Top Israeli ministers have not reached a final decision on whether to accept a UN proposal for an international probe into the Israel Navy's deadly raid on a Gaza-bound aid flotilla.

International pressure is growing for an external investigation of last week's raid.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's forum of seven ministers convened Sunday evening to discuss the matter, but the meeting ended at around 11 p.m. without a decision. Netanyahu and most of the ministers apparently prefer an Israeli probe in which Americans and other foreigners would have observer status.

Netanyahu spoke by telephone Sunday evening with a number of close allies, including U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden, French President Nicolas Sarkozy, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Georgian Prime Minister Nika Gilauri and UN envoy Tony Blair.

The Israeli leader emphasized during these conversations, as he has since the proposal was first made, that Israel had acted in self-defence, just as any other country would if faced with the threat of thousands of missiles and rockets.

Sarkozy urged Netanyahu during their phone conversation to accept the UN proposal, and even offered France's help in such a probe. Sarkozy also stressed the urgent need for a solution to end Israel's blockade of Hamas-ruled Gaza in a way that would also guarantee Israel's security, according to a statement from the French president's office.

Earlier Sunday, Israel rejected the proposal for a joint international probe, saying it had the right to launch an internal investigation.

"We are rejecting an international commission. We are discussing with the Obama administration a way in which our inquiry will take place," Michael Oren, Israel's ambassador to Washington, said on the U.S. TV program Fox News Sunday.

UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon had suggested establishing a panel that would be headed by former New Zealand prime minister Geoffrey Palmer and include representatives from Turkey, Israel and the United States, an Israeli official said earlier in Jerusalem.

Netanyahu discussed the proposal for a multinational panel with Ban in a telephone call on Saturday, but told cabinet ministers from his right-wing Likud party on Sunday that Israel was exploring other options, political sources said.

Soap Tests Negative

MONTREAL — A bar of soap said to be made from the fat of Holocaust victims that was for sale in a Montreal curio shop doesn't contain human remains, police said last week. The bar, engraved with a swastika, was sent for testing at an Ontario lab, which found no human DNA, Canadian Press reported. The shop's Jewish owner, Abraham Botines, said he got the soap from a Canadian World War II veteran who said it was made from the fat of Nazi camp victims. It was seized after B'nai Brith Canada complained. Police said they'll return the bar and won't charge Botines.

Gay Honours Refused

TORONTO — Three gay and lesbian activists have turned down honours from Pride Toronto, citing free speech and Pride's decision to ban the group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid from marching in this year's Pride Parade. Michelle Walker, co-founder of the Vancouver Dyke March, declined Pride Toronto's 2010 community service award, while Dr. Alan Li turned down the grand marshal position, and author and broadcaster Jane Farrow rejected the "honoured dyke" title at the Pride Toronto Dyke March, the gay and lesbian magazine Xtra! reported. In a letter to Pride Toronto, Farrow said that the issue isn't about Mideast politics. "It simply comes down to protecting the right to free speech."

IPO Falls Short

TEL AVIV — An initial public offering by the Azrieli Group – the largest ever on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange – failed to raise a hoped-for $728 million (US) for 25 per cent of the firm, which would have put the worth of the entire company at $2.9 million and made it the ninth-largest firm on the blue-chip Tel Aviv 25 index. Instead, the sale raised $520 million (US), putting it on the TA-100 index. The company speculated that Israel's May 31 raid on a flotilla carrying cargo to Gaza had spooked markets, the Israeli business paper Globes reported last week.

World

App Divides J-lem

JERUSALEM — Yahoo's weather application for the iPhone has divided Jerusalem. Users of the pre-installed application must now choose between west Jerusalem and east Jerusalem, West Bank, to get the weather for the city following a change that went into effect earlier this month. The temperature information for both choices is identical and the information for both comes from the same weather station, identified on the Yahoo weather pages as Jerusalem, Israel.

Darrow Author Dies

CHICAGO — Lila Weinberg, a Chicago historian, author, teacher and editor, has died. Weinberg, who died May 29 at 91 from complications of cancer, collaborated with her late husband, Arthur, on six books on social history, including two on prominent U.S. civil rights lawyer Clarence Darrow. One, Clarence Darrow: Attorney for the Damned, spent 19 weeks on the New York Times bestseller list in 1957. Arthur Weinberg died in 1989.

Reporter Attacked

MOSCOW — A TV reporter was attacked by soccer fans who reportedly shouted "beat the kikes" and "kill the Jews" during the attack. Roman Kosarev, from the English-language channel Russia Today, suffered a concussion after being attacked in Rostov on the Don by fans of St. Petersburg soccer club Zenit ahead of its Russian Cup final with Sibir Novosibirsk.

Rihanna Takes Stage in Tel Aviv

TEL AVIV — R&B singer Rihanna performed in Israel for the first time.

Rihanna's concert on May 30 was part of her "Last Girl on Earth" European tour. Audience members had to participate in four hours of volunteer activity in order to receive tickets to the show at the Bloomfield Stadium in Tel Aviv. About 10,000 fans received tickets to the concert.

Rihanna

The Barbados-born star spent the weekend before her show touring Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. She helped Scouts and volunteers in Tel Aviv to paint the walls of their meeting centre. In Jerusalem, she visited the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and the Western Wall, where she put a note in its cracks.

Rihanna's decision to perform in Israel comes after rocker Elvis Costello's decision last month to cancel his June 30 and July 1 shows in Caesarea as a political protest.

Canada may consider importing Israeli isotopes

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The ongoing shortage of medical isotopes in Canada has prompted an international supplier to try to import a surplus supply located in Israel.

But last week, Health Canada said it had refused the offer because the supplier had not gone through the appropriate channels.

According to a May 31 report in the Toronto Sun, Lantheus Medical Imagine had proposed an offer to get Israeli surplus isotope "generators" that had been processed using isotopes Israel had purchased from South Africa.

An isotope generator is the device used to obtain Technetium-99 (Tc-99) – a key isotope used in medical imaging – from molybdenum-99, another radioactive isotope used in nuclear medical diagnostics.

Tc-99 has been in short supply worldwide since Canada's Chalk River nuclear reactor – which supplies two-thirds of the world's medical isotopes – was shut down for repairs in May 2009. The shortage worsened in December when the Dutch High Flux reactor went off line for six months.

The Ontario Association of Nuclear Medicine said supply in the province last week was "15 per cent of normal." The Quebec Association of Nuclear Medicine Specialists also said its province was experiencing similar shortfalls.

Gary Holub, spokesperson for Health Canada, told The CJN via e-mail that although the source of the isotope from South Africa is known to his agency, "the final product manufactured in Israel has never been evaluated for its safety, effectiveness or quality."

According to Holub, no formal submission to bring the isotopes to Canada was ever filed for review with Health Canada.

"Health Canada did not receive a submission from Lantheus or anyone else for the authorization to sell/import generators from Israel," he wrote, adding "Health Canada received a single inquiry on the potential for importation of generators from Israel."

Health Canada would not release the name of the third party, Golub wrote, "as this information would be deemed confidential business information."

He noted that anyone interested in bringing the Israeli isotopes to Canada would be best served by applying through the department special access program, which was established to provide practitioners with access to non-authorized products.

The program could conceivably be used to fast-track the isotopes to Canada after "due diligence" on the application was done, Holub said.

Health Canada's website describes the program as one that "allows doctors to gain access to non-marketed drugs and medical devices that have not yet been approved for sale in Canada. Practitioners treating patients with serious or life-threatening conditions request special access in cases where conventional therapies have failed, are unavailable or are unsuitable."

As of late last week, Holub told The CJN there was still no new information about whether Lantheus or anyone else had applied to the program to get the Israeli isotopes. He also could not confirm whether the inquiring party had provided the name of the Israeli supplier.

Calls from The CJN to Lantheus weren't returned.

Jonathan Levy, Israel's consul for economic affairs and trade commissioner to Canada, said he had no further information on the issue other than what has already been reported and said he was never contacted by Health Canada, Lantheus or an Israeli isotope manufacturer on the subject.

However, he said that to his knowledge, the major producer of this sort of material in Israel would likely be the Soreq Nuclear Research Center, an affiliate of the Israel Atomic Energy Commission.

A search by The CJN found another two Israel-based isotope manufacturers, Advanced Materials Technologies Ltd. (AMT) located in Nes Ziona; and Marshall-Isotopes Ltd., in Tel Aviv.

Neither returned queries by The CJN's deadline.

The truth above all

From the editor's desk...

The "flotilla fiasco" dominated our feelings and emotions last week as much as it dominated the news. "Fiasco," in most quarters, was a reference to the Israeli naval operation enforcing the blockade of Hamas-ruled Gaza that resulted in the deaths of nine people who sailed with the flotilla.

Because of the violence involving Israel on one of the six ships of the flotilla, there was a super-barrage of media coverage and commentary of the incident. (Please see According to Reports on page 18).

The loss of life in the operation stunned the Israelis as much as it did the rest of the world. They had clearly not anticipated the violent reception that awaited them when they boarded the Mavi Marmara. They had not prepared for it. They had not wanted it. They regretted it. But they fought to save their own lives. In the fighting, they killed nine combatant/activitists.

The real "fiasco," however, in the flotilla incident was, once again, the immediately reflexive, one-sided, morally inverted, hysterical condemnations of Israel.

The statements from the usual sources in the United Nations, the halls of the Arab League and, of course, on the roiling "Arab streets" were entirely predictable, but no less outrageous and infuriating for their predictability. (See the photo, inset, of young Palestinian children stomping on the Israeli flag.)

From Israel's enemies, such behaviour was expected. But even from the West we witnessed yet again the displacement of truth by deceit and dissembling, a repeat of the screeching indignation after the phantom "massacres" in Jenin and Kafr Kana (south Lebanon) to name but two examples.

The rush to judgement of Israel was itself obscene and, alas, disheartening.

To paraphrase the Israeli political analyst, Barry Rubin, if democracies are to survive in this world, they had better start cherishing, seeking and speaking truth. Yet, in no conflict on earth is the truth less cherished and less spoken, than in Israel's conflict with the Palestinians.

Truth is the enemy of the well-organized, well-financed many who are determined to delegitimize and dismantle the Jewish state.

The presentation of distorted facts surrounding the boarding last week of the Mavi Marmara by Israel well illustrates the sinister but clever anti-Israel campaign at work. Thus, it's important to re-state and re-emphasize basic first principles regarding some of the many aspects of the blockade and Israel's sometimes wise, sometimes unwise efforts to enforce it.

1. Hamas. Gaza is ruled by cadre of militant Muslim extremists whose first goal, above all others, is the elimination of the only Jewish state in the world. Alongside this goal, but not of higher priority to the Hamas leaders than the first goal, is the establishment of a Talibanesque theocracy in Gaza, in the West Bank and in all of "occupied Palestine," i.e., Israel.

In the latest edition of The New Republic, Martin Peretz, the magazine's former editor-in-chief, accurately describes Hamas as "the Palestinian counterpart of the movements of dread that now course throughout the world of Islam and against which the West and moderate Muslims are struggling."

Since Hamas violently wrested control of Gaza from the Palestine Liberation Organization, the hallmark of Hamas' rule has been its insatiable obsession with harming Israel. Hamas has spent far less time and far less material in trying to build Gaza than it has in trying to kill Israelis. (Indeed four more Qassem rockets were fired at Israel last Thursday night.)

Israel is at war with Hamas.

It is, therefore, according to internationally and historically recognized rules, entitled to prevent weapons and weaponry from reaching Hamas hands. The blockade of the Gaza shoreline is entirely ethical and within the law.

2. Humanitarianism. Each day, each week, each month, Israel allows all manner of humanitarian goods to enter Gaza. The lists of the content and the quantities are freely available. Gazans are not deprived of humanitarian aid, except to the extent that their Hamas leaders hoard for themselves or to ensure artificially created shortages, the goods that enter their borders.

Hamas has no contact whatsoever with the concept of humanitarianism. Hamas kidnapped Gilad Schalit in 2006. He has been held captive ever since. Hamas taunts him, his family and all Israelis. They have not allowed the Red Cross to visit him ever.

3. The peace activists. The "activists" who awaited the Israeli soldiers on the Mavi Marmara have been more active in warfare than in peace. In the main, they were members of IHH, a Turkish "humanitarian relief fund" with ties to Al Qaeda, Iran and Algeria. As we saw on the various film footages provided by Israel and by the ship's own cameras, the IHH members attacked the Israeli soldiers. The soldiers attacked back.

There are a great many other truths about the events of last week and about Israel's conflict with the Palestinians that it is our duty to impart. We will never cease doing so. It is our obligation to our parents, our children and humanity.

CIE gets additional funding from federation

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The Canada Israel Experience (CIE) will receive $150,000 in additional funding this summer from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The funding, which will be added to the more than $1 million that federation allocated to CIE this year, is part of a new young-adult engagement initiative and will be used to enhance such young-adult programming as the Birthright Israel Alumni Community (BAC).

Shauna Waltman

"Greater engagement of young adults in Jewish community life is a really high priority," said Howard English, federation's vice-president of strategic communications. "[Engagement] sets the stage in young adulthood for participation throughout the decades, so we're investing a lot more resources."

This initiative will provide more leadership training opportunities for youth and new programs in conjunction with organizations such as the Koffler Centre or Jewish Family and Child of Toronto.

For Shauna Waltman, BAC's director, the extra funding means more staff, a broader mandate and a chance to connect to twice as many young Jews.

"We're the official alumni organization for Birthright Israel in Toronto... our goal is to inspire Jewish young adults to connect to the community in their own terms," she said.

"We're looking to personally connect with 600 to 700 individuals, that's our goal," she said, adding that, in 2009, BAC connected with 200 young adults.

The organization supports some 170 to 200 events a year, including the annual Hoops 4 Israel event and various social and charitable initiatives, many of them run by Birthright Israel alumni.

With the new funding, BAC will be reaching out to all young adults in the Jewish community, rather than just Birthright Israel alumni, Waltman said.

"Alumni don't see themselves as different from their peers that didn't go on the trip... It's a common finding among young adults, once they graduate, many of them... don't have any idea what's available to them post-university," she said.

This is where BAC comes in.

"I believe the expansion will help fill that need and help provide an outlet to young adults in general."

According to a 2009 Brandeis University study on alumni engagement in New York, Toronto, San Francisco and Los Angeles, about 74 per cent of Birthright alumni in Toronto are aware of BAC programming, compared to an average of 48 per cent in the American cities, which have a similar organization called Birthright NEXT.

The study also showed that about 38 per cent of alumni in Toronto participate in BAC programming, compared to 19 per cent in the United States.

Waltman attributes BAC's success to the staff's ability at forming personal connections.

"We don't believe in massive events to massive markets... we would prefer 10 targeted events that capture 10 people. We feel that when people come to a smaller event that really speaks to them... that's going to make them want to come back," she said.

"Everything we do comes back to the personal relationships we establish. It's one thing when someone receives an e-mail... a lot of people are receiving personal phone calls."

For Jessica Taylor, who went on Birthright in 2005, BAC is a way to stay in touch with friends and contribute to her community.

"I think a lot of their programs create a comfortable environment," she said. "I think the whole point of the Birthright experience is not just to experience the culture but to bring that home and help build the community here."

Rushdie, Wiesel sound concern about Iran

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Iran's controversial president and its budding nuclear program were among the topics addressed by two high-powered, internationally renowned novelists in Toronto last week.

At a "Spirit of Hope" benefit at Beth Tzedec Congregation sponsored by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, Salman Rushdie and Elie Wiesel both sounded grave concerns about Iran.

Rushdie and Wiesel were formally introduced by former Canadian prime minister, Brian Mulroney, who delivered an impassioned speech praising Canada for evolving into "an imperfect but quite wonderful" tolerant and pluralistic nation.

Before launching into a survey of the discrimination that new immigrants, especially Jews, once faced in Canada, Mulroney made an oblique reference to his own personal travails.

"And how was your day?' he asked jocularly to a ripple of nervous laughter and applause.

Only hours earlier, Canadian Justice Jeffrey Oliphant delivered a report suggesting that Mulroney, after leaving office, had acted inappropriately in accepting about $225,000 from Canadian businessman Karlheinz Schreiber, who is currently serving eight years in prison in Germany for tax evasion.

Rushdie, the British writer whose novel, The Satanic Verses, prompted Iran's former spiritual leader to impose a death sentence on him in 1989, called Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, "a pretty poisonous individual."

Rushdie, a secular Muslim born in India, cautioned that Ahmadinejad by no means has a monopoly on power in Iran. The Revolutionary Guards, he observed, may well be in control of the country.

He warned that an armed attack on Iran's nuclear facilities would be a mistake, uniting the Iranian population behind the current leadership and possibly touching off a world war.

Wiesel, a Holocaust survivor and winner of the Nobel Prize in peace, said that Ahmadinejad, a Holocaust denier, should be arrested, brought to the International Criminal Court in The Hague and indicted for crimes against humanity because he wants to destroy Israel.

Wiesel, whose novels delve into the darkest recesses of the Holocaust, said that Ahmadinejad told a European diplomat recently that he would not hesitate to use nuclear weapons against Israel.

Asserting that Iran must not be allowed to acquire a nuclear arsenal, he urged the international community to apply maximum economic and political pressure on Iran so that it cannot develop an atomic bomb.

He did not explicitly call for a military strike on Iran's nuclear sites, saying he's opposed to war and knows the price it can exact. But he would not tell Israel how to proceed in trying to stop Iran's march toward nuclearization.

Salman Rushdie

Elie Wiesel

Brian Mulroney

Touching on the Arab-Israeli conflict, Rushdie said that the Palestinians will be more receptive to ending violence after their economic conditions have improved.

The sources of Islamic radicalism, he noted, are political oppression and poverty.

Rushdie lamented that intellectual freedoms, including the right to free speech, have come under attack by religious authorities in various countries.

But the problem is particularly acute in the Muslim world, he said.

Rushdie admitted that the Iranian fatwa issued on his life led him to believe that he did not have long to live.

Wiesel said he has reason to be optimistic, citing the defeat of Nazism and Communism, the birth of Israel and the continuing existence of the Jews, the only ancient people who have survived antiquity.

But in a lurch toward pessimism, he ticked off humanitarian catastrophes in Darfur, Rwanda, Bosnia and Cambodia and spoke about the rise of suicide bombers in the Middle East.

Wiesel expressed doubt whether another Holocaust will engulf Jews, but he speculated that the mass murder of other groups is possible. As he put it, "Evil has more imagination than goodness."

In his talk, Mulroney chided Canada for its flirtation with anti-Semitism prior to World War II. "Canada has very little to be smug about," he said. "Canada's heritage and promise were betrayed."

Mulroney read excerpts from the diary of William Lyon Mackenzie King, the former Canadian prime minister who revealed himself as an anti-Semite who admired Adolf Hitler's personality.

In his closing remarks, Mulroney praised Israelis as "valorous people" and complimented Canadian Jews for their "magnificent contributions" to Canada.

Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean and founder of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said that Jews and Arabs in the Middle East will coexist in peace only after the Arabs "bury the hatchet" and recognize Israel as the "democratic homeland of the Jewish people."

Jews urged to remain strong after flotilla incident

Markham mayor honoured by Chabad

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

The Jewish community should stick together while the world waits for all the facts to come out about last week's confrontation between Israeli soldiers and pro-Palestinian activists aboard a flotilla of ships headed for Gaza, says Markham, Ont., mayor Frank Scarpitti.

"Be strong," Scarpitti advised in an interview with The CJN last week.

"I don't think the world really appreciates the pressure that Israel is under all the time from potential attacks and incidents that may happen at a moment's notice."

He made the comments at this year's Spirit of Community dinner, a June 2 fundraiser for the Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre, where he was being honoured with Beth Chabad's 2010 community service award.

Each year, the centre honours people who have helped create a strong and healthy community.

To raise funds for the centre, there was a live auction in which guests bid thousands of dollars for prizes, including an authentic Vancouver 2010 Team Canada hockey jersey signed by Sidney Crosby, and the opportunity to name a street in Vaughan.

In total, the event collected about $240,000, with proceeds going to the centre, said spokesperson Yehudit Danzinger.

To demonstrate Scarpitti's commitment and connection to his community, a video was shown in which people described his character and actions, including a clip of him singing in Chinese as part of Chinese New Year celebrations.

Also being honoured was Dan Farine, a professor of obstetrics and gynecology at the University of Toronto and a specialist in high-risk pregnancies. He received the centre's humanitarian award for his achievements in obstetrics and for sharing his knowledge and skills with students.

"I've received over the years many teaching awards, but I have never received an award like [this]," Farine said.

He told guests that his patients always thank him and think he's done something great in delivering their babies, particularly ones from high-risk pregnancies.

He said he does his work with a sense of joy. "It's so much fun, and I enjoy so much pleasure in delivering the babies."

More than 700 people were on hand to hear keynote speaker Dennis Prager, a U.S. radio talk show host, as he discussed how his Jewish upbringing influenced his values and how he believes people can achieve happiness.

He told The CJN his frequent visits to Toronto have allowed him to see it as his "home away from home."

It's unique for a large city to have such a tight-knit Jewish community, he said. "In New York, for example, you are not a member of the New York Jewish community. You're a member of your local synagogue."

But Toronto has found a way to balance both the larger and smaller communities, he added.

Scarpitti said it's because of organizations such as Chabad Lubavitch and its integration of new immigrants that the GTA has been able to find this balance.

When someone comes to a new country, it takes an average of 15 years for them to fully integrate into their community, he said, adding that he's particularly inspired when faith communities come forward to welcome newcomers.

It's vital for immigrants to get firmly planted, he said. "If they're living in a world where they're disconnected, it's not a great experience."

Talking Turkey

It can only be with increasing alarm and spreading dread that western leaders, military officials and policy-makers view the fiery, brazen, overtly hostile behaviour of Turkey's Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan toward Israel. The conclusion begs to be drawn that the leader of the Islamically based Justice and Development party is determined to re-orient his country's policies and alliances away from the Jewish state (and the West too) towards fellow Muslim, but not necessarily Arab, states such as Iran.

The video and film footage of the violence last week on the Turkish ship Mavi Marmara places beyond doubt – at least to the fair-minded person – that the individuals swinging steel pipes and thrusting knives at the Israeli soldiers were not benign "activists" but rather hardened, trained members of the Islamic group from Istanbul called Insani Vardi Vakfi, or IHH in its English-language acronym, which arranged for the Mavi Marmara to join the six-ship "aid" flotilla.

Since its founding in the mid-1990s, IHH has been linked by western governments and security services to radical Islamist organizations and to Al Qaeda and Hamas.

Neither IHH nor the Turkish government that supports it were truly interested in delivering humanitarian aid to the Palestinians. Humanitarian aid reaches the residents of Gaza every day. Indeed, Israel had promised to allow all non-military goods and products to the Palestinians after the boats were inspected.

Rather, IHH and the Erdogan government were interested in provoking a confrontation with Israel. They succeeded. The result was nine Turks dead, rabid indignation expressed by the Turkish government toward Israel, world-wide condemnation of Israel and a wildly enthusiastic boost of support for Hamas. Erdogan has been a booster of Hamas ever since it seized control of Gaza from the PA.

Erdogan helped orchestrate the Mavi Marmara incident on which he now relies as a justification for pulling away from Israel. He recalled his ambassador from Israel and announced that his government is considering reducing its relations with Jerusalem to a minimum. There have since been reports that Turkey has demanded an apology from Israel as a possible pretext for severing diplomatic ties with the Jewish state. A prosecutor in Istanbul is reportedly now gathering evidence for a potential case against Israeli officials.

Most of us recall the bizarre, raging behaviour of Erdogan toward Israeli President Shimon Peres at the World Economic Forum in Davos in January 2009. "When it comes to killing, you know well how to kill," Erdogan fumed at Peres, before storming off the stage at the end of a panel discussion. His party officials have referred to Israel as a pirate and a terrorist state.

There is no doubting the supportive hand and clenched fist of the government of Turkey behind the events last week on the Mavi Marmara. Western governments should be alarmed. They should not allow a member of NATO and an aspirant for EU membership to have as its foreign policy the undermining of the only democracy in the Middle East. And they should make this clear to Turkey's prime minister.

Speaking to 1,000 people at a State of Israel Bonds dinner in Montreal, prime minister Brian Mulroney pledged Canada's unswerving support for Israel, but he said the realization of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people must be part of any overall peace deal between Israel and its Arab neighbours.

Visible Jews intimidated on campus

In his letter to the editor ("Brandeis distorted and misrepresented," May 27), Prof. Ilan Troen objects to the editor's dire assessment of the anti-Israel culture on his campus ("A devastatingly sad day," Editor's desk, May 13) as overblown. With respect, both sides miss the point. The issue, at bottom, is that visible Jews asserting their historic national identity today are singled out for the kind of intimidation, vilification and demonization on American campuses that is not, and would not be, officially tolerated for a moment with respect to any other historically vulnerable group.

Our right to all the Land of Israel

The column "Existential repercussions" (From the editor's desk, May 21), on "the international campaign to delegitimize the Jewish state," and Ruth Gavison's speech at the University of Toronto ("Declare interest in a 'just peace,' prof advises Israel," May 21) illustrate the conundrum we Jews find ourselves in: at one end, supporters of the Jewish state appear to be losing the war of words being waged about Israel's right to exist, and at the other end, so-called supporters of Israel mindlessly feed into this evil design. How are we to win this war when our own people adopt the rhetoric of our enemies?

When Gavison declares Israel's survival depends on accepting "Palestinian" statehood, one has to question the credibility of everything she says. After World War I, the principal Allied powers, meeting in San Remo in 1920, recognized the historical connection of the Jewish People to their ancestral home and it became the basis of the Mandate for Palestine, approved by the League of Nations. Hence the resolution forms part of international law and is irrevocable with respect to the rights of the Jewish People to the whole of "Palestine." And it is valid till today under international law. We must tell those purveyors of a phony, hopeless "peace process" that requires Israel to yield territory, that they are in violation of our right to all the land of Israel, which, in addition to God's law, is forever enshrined in international law.

New Israel Fund's record distorted

Assertions were recently made in The CJN that the New Israel Fund funds violent groups ("Criticism key to democracy, New Israel Fund president says," May 13; "New Israel Fund's grants," letters, May 21). This is utterly false. The NIF does not fund any groups that have engaged in or espouse violence. Period. It never has, and it never will. Nor has the NIF funded any groups that question Israel's right to exist as the homeland of the Jewish people.

Indeed, for more than 30 years NIF has funded many NGOs whose basic mission has been to fight violence and build bridges across the divisions in Israeli society. NIF funded shelters for women victimized by domestic violence when no one else would. NIF continues to lead the way to promote tolerance and alternatives to violent confrontation, whether inculcating respect for non-Orthodox Judaism among Jews, or fostering dialogue and mutual respect for civil rights between Jewish and Arab citizens of Israel. It is unfortunate that there are some, either due to misinformation or a different vision of Israel, who would distort NIF's exemplary record of helping build a just and democratic Israel.

Lies about NIF

In the article "Criticism key to democracy, New Israel Fund president says" (May 13), it is stated that I have been supporting the NIF since its inception and support about 80 per cent of its views, and in The CJN writer's words, "disagreeing mostly with its granting funds to what she called violent Palestinian groups." Then, in the letter to the editor "New Israel Fund's grants" (May 21), the letter writer erroneously picked up the words from The CJN article, as if they were what I had said. Please note, "about 80 per cent" is not a statistic. It is an indication that I mostly support NIF views and actions. I do not need to approve 100 per cent of their choices, but I would draw the line at support of violent Palestinian groups. I continue to support NIF because they, in fact, do not support violent Palestinian groups, of which they have been wrongfully accused. As Jews and as humans, we are rightfully outraged when propaganda is fabricated against Israel by those who do not agree with its views and actions, in order to vilify and delegitimize it. We should be equally outraged when the same is done to a respectable organization such as NIF by those who wish to delegitimize its human rights work. Accusers are responsible to bring proof, and no proof has been brought to support the lies about NIF.

Flotilla deaths could sink Israel's ties with Turkey

By YIGAL SCHLEIFER
JTA

While Turkey and Israel have seen their once-close relationship deteriorate steadily over the past few years, the Israeli commando raid of a Turkish-led flotilla heading for Gaza, in which several Turks were killed, marks a dangerous new low in the countries' relations.

"Turkey is now involved in a way it's never been before: blood has been spilled," said Hugh Pope, a Turkey analyst with the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based policy and advocacy organization.

Following the May 31 raid, massive street protests broke out in Turkey, and the country recalled its ambassador from Israel and summoned Israel's ambassador to Ankara.

Addressing parliament June 1, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan spoke in harsh terms that seemed to leave little room for an easy rapprochement with Israel.

"This bloody massacre by Israel on ships that were taking humanitarian aid to Gaza deserves every kind of curse," Erdogan said. "This attack is on international law, the conscience of humanity and world peace.

"No one should test Turkey's patience," he added. "Turkey's hostility is as strong as its friendship is valuable."

Nine Turks were killed by Israeli commandos in the raid. Dozens of others suffered wounds, including several Israeli soldiers.

The deterioration in the Turkish-Israeli relationship, much of it connected to the fallout from Israel's 2009 Gaza invasion, has been mirrored by an equally precipitous rise in Turkey's visibility and involvement in the Middle East – an area that it had kept at arm's length for decades, because of historical enmity and mutual suspicion.

Until recently, Turkey's growing regional role included a desire to parlay its good relations with both Israel and Arab states into a role as a regional mediator. Ankara, for example, hosted Israel and Syria for a round of secret peace talks in 2008 that ultimately failed. All along, Turkey has continued its close military cooperation with the Jewish state.

But for now, analysts say, Turkey appears to have abandoned its mediation efforts in the region in return for a more pronounced leadership role in the Muslim world. On May 31, Turkey cancelled plans to hold a joint military exercise with the Israel Defence Forces

"For the time being, I don't see any kind of opening for the peace process," said Gencer Ozcan, an expert on Turkey-Israel relations at Istanbul's Bilgi University. "So if there isn't any peace process, there isn't any need for the good offices of a mediator."

Pope said: "It's going to be very hard for Turkey to portray itself as a neutral mediator with Israel anymore."

Andrew Finkel, a columnist with the English-language daily Today's Zaman, said that Turkey's declared policy of "zero problems with neighbours" has come to a "juddering halt" in the case of Israel.

"Instead, Ankara appears to have given its tacit consent to another policy of sharpening contradictions, of trying to lance the boil instead of putting soothing ointment on the blister," he said.

While Turkey may earn short-term gains from distancing itself from Israel, there are concerns about the long-term effect a serious breach between the two countries might have on an already conflict-ridden region.

"Turkey has gradually been losing one of the most significant leverages that it was using in the Arab world," Ozcan said. "Even the Palestinians were telling Ankara over the years to keep talking to the Israelis."

Turkey's harsh response to Israel's action is yet another signal of an important shift in Turkish foreign policy, analysts say, with Turkey taking a more assertive role both regionally and globally. The government of the liberal Islamic Justice and Development Party (AKP), which first came into office in 2002, has worked to forge close relations with neighbours such as Syria and Iran.

"The AKP's project is positioning Turkey," said Anat Lapidot-Firilla, a senior research fellow at Jerusalem's Van Leer Institute. "It's a project whose goal is to set up Turkey as an international player, on the one hand, and to get recognition of Turkey as a moderate, market-friendly leader in the Muslim world and be treated as such in international bodies."

Sami Kohen, a veteran Turkish political analyst and columnist who writes for the Milliyet daily, says Turkey's hand in the region is strengthened now.

"There is now more reason for Turkey to take a more active part in the events of the Middle East, since it has suffered personally from this attack," Kohen said. "Now it can justify its anti-Israeli positions, which get a good deal of sympathy in the Arab and Islamic world."

Jews fear backlash will turn into anti-Semitism

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Turkey may reduce its relations with Israel to "a minimum"over the Israel Navy's boarding on May 31 of the Turkish-flagged ship, Mavi Marmara, bound for the Gaza Strip, Turkish Deputy Prime Minister Bulent Arinc said last Friday

Arinc told NTV broadcaster that Turkey was "assessing deals with Israel" in the clearest sign yet that Muslim Turkey may significantly reduce its ties with once-close ally Israel after nine of its nationals were killed in clashes with the Israeli commandos who stormed their ship.

Thousands attended the funeral on June 3 in Istanbul for the people killed in the IDF raid.

"We may plan to reduce our relations with Israel to a minimum, but to assume everything involving another country is stopped in an instant, to say we have crossed you out of our address book, is not the custom of our state," he told broadcaster NTV.

The incident has brought bilateral relations to the brink and Turkey has already recalled its ambassador to Israel. Speaking on television last Wednesday, Turkish President Abdullah Gul said relations between the two countries "will never be as they were before."

"Israel has made one of the biggest mistakes in its history," he added.

Also last Friday, Turkish media reported that a prosecutor in Istanbul has started collecting evidence for a possible case against Israeli officials in the wake of Israel's commando raid.

The reports said the prosecutor has been gathering testimony and evidence from Turks who returned from Israel in order to determine whether Turkey should open a case demanding compensation from Israel or even pursue criminal charges against Israeli leaders.

A Turkish newspaper editor told the European Jewish press last Wednesday that Turkey's Jewish community feared that the backlash over the boarding incident would provoke anti-Semitism in the Muslim nation.

The editor of the Istanbul-based weekly Salom, Ivo Molinas, said that "we are definitely worried, because [the anger in Turkey] can turn very easily to anti-Semitism."

"The rhetoric used by the prime minister [Recep Tayyip Erdogan] has been very radical," added Molinas, part of the 26,000-member Jewish community living in Turkey.

"But the prime minister also said [last Tuesday] that he was against anti-Semitism. He says it during each crisis, but he repeated it [Tuesday]," said Molinas, whose newspaper has a circulation of around 5,000.

"Both he and the leaders of the opposition have said that all of this will have no effect on the Jews of Turkey," he added.

Speaking to the Turkish parliament on June 1, Erdogan accused Israel of a "bloody massacre" and declared that "now Israel has shown to all the world how well it knows how to kill."

Turkey recalled its ambassador and Erdogan, charging Israel with "state terrorism," called for those responsible for the deaths to be punished.

All nine of the men killed – eight Turks and a Turk with a U.S. passport – were on the Mavi Marmara when Israeli commandos boarded the Turkish ship in international waters.

"Turkey will never forget such an attack on its ships and its people in international waters. Turkey's ties with Israel will never be the same again," Gul told a news conference.

A U.S. State Department official said that one of the nine people killed in the Israeli raid was a 19-year-old man with dual U.S.-Turkish citizenship. The official identified the victim as Furkan Dogan, who was believed to have been living in Turkey.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity, because the information hasn't been officially confirmed by the U.S. government. The official said the victim had been shot, but it wasn't clear who shot him.

Distorting history with maps

Land claims, in their sensitivity and complexity, have been a recurring sticking point in the Arab-Israeli conflict. Addressing them on their merits, and with due regard to historic realities, is difficult enough, but having to then deal with their frequently revisionist interpretations – by Palestinian interlocutors and their apologists – makes an already complicated negotiation that much more frustrating.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Yet regardless of the implicitly propagandist machinations of what has come to be known as the "Palestinian land loss narrative," the case promoting it has become entrenched within a broader mosaic of fabrication that all too often defines the Arab perspective in any discourse on the Israeli-Palestinian impasse.

A sequence of maps is the current instrument of choice to describe and embellish the notion of "land loss." The drawings, of which there are usually four, purport to show the usurping of "Palestinian territory" between 1946 and 2009. The 1946 map shows tiny pockets of Jewish settlements in British Mandate Palestine, with all of the rest, in bright green for added emphasis, labelled as Arab lands. That the Arabs at that time had no sovereignty over the area, and owned less than half of it, is a mere detail that escapes mention.

The next two maps draw attention to the changing demography in diminishing areas of "green," after Israel fended off its Arab attackers in 1948 and 1967, respectively. These then segue to the fourth illustration, which identifies only tiny enclaves of residual Palestinian land, speckled through what is presumably the West Bank and no doubt meant to portray the "bantustans" that the Israelis have been accused of creating.

What is so flagrantly perverse about these depictions is that they entirely omit any context or commentary that might even remotely create a foundation for rational discussion. For example, all of the agreements from the Balfour Declaration onward are overlooked, the legitimacy of the partition plan that established the State of Israel is denied and Israel's ceding of the Sinai and Gaza is ignored.

In summing up the deceit of the maps, Ami Isseroff, chief editor at the Zionism-Israel Center (http://zionism-israel.com) lamented that "like the 'apartheid' slogan, the maps and the ideas they represent are coming to be accepted as mainstream and legitimate." He cautions that it needs to be understood that what the distributors of the maps hope to promote with them is "an irredentist claim over the land for the Arabs of Palestine… not only the area of the West Bank and Gaza, but the entire land, 'from the river to the sea' – all of the land that was covered 'green' in the 1946 map – the 'lost' land."

Three recent incidents test Israeli democracy

The adage "I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it," incorrectly attributed to Voltaire, is viewed as a source of freedom of speech and expression and the right to demonstrate.

In democracies worldwide, courts, legislatures, the press and academics debate the appropriate scope of these rights and the proper characterization of these freedoms. Should people be allowed to express views even if they're seditious, inciting or extremely distasteful to the majority? Should all forms of protest be allowed, and if not, what ought to be their reasonable limits.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Israel isn't the only democracy dealing with these questions, but with so many weighty issues facing us, we seem to be debating them more than others.

Three recent examples help identify some of the quandaries.

American linguistics professor Noam Chomsky holds opinions that delegitimize Israel as a Jewish state, opinions that are anathema to most Israelis and many Jews around the globe. Last month, he tried crossing the Jordan River to give a lecture at Bir Zeit University, not far from Ramallah. Israel still controls border crossings on the Jordan River and monitors Palestinians and foreigners entering Israel and the West Bank through them. When Chomsky arrived, a Ministry of Interior official, reportedly using her personal discretion (or lack thereof), denied him entrance.

While most Israeli commentators, politicians and academics abhor Chomsky's views, nearly all rightfully criticized the decision to prevent his entry to lecture. Aside from the unacceptable abridgment of free speech, the decision also created a PR fiasco, leading to Chomsky and his views receiving much more press than they would have otherwise.

The second incident, this time of proactive PR, was the Palestinian Authority's decision to boycott all goods produced in Israeli West Bank settlements. In the public discussion that ensued, many observers thought this was a classic case of the Palestinians "cutting off their nose to spite their face." The people most detrimentally affected by the decision would be Palestinians who'll lose jobs in settlements. There were also those who asserted the decision was a form of economic terrorism.

Whether you support Israel's settlement policy in the West Bank or not, it's hard to persuasively argue that the Palestinian Authority boycott is anything but a valid, non-violent protest aimed at advancing the Palestinians' assertion that Israeli settlements are illegitimate.

That's not the case with our third example, the Turkish-backed "humanitarian" flotilla to Gaza. Because of deadline limitations, as these lines were being written, we awaited the docking in Ashdod of the largest of these ships, the one on which a violent altercation occurred between Israeli soldiers and activists. It was reported that 10 civilians were killed. Thirty were injured, as were seven soldiers, attacked in lynch-like style by extremists as they boarded the ship.

Israel is once again being lambasted. It's a PR disaster, with talk of disproportionate use of force, innocent civilians killed, diplomatic ramifications and more.

For this discussion, let's consider whether the flotilla was an acceptable form of protest against Israel's blockade of Gaza, or whether Israel's decision to intercept it was justified

In the weeks leading up to the clash, Israel reiterated that security considerations proscribed the flotilla docking in Gaza, because it was suspected that some of the "aid" was actually material meant to shore up Hamas' military capabilities. It therefore suggested sending the ships' cargo via Israeli ports, guaranteeing that any truly humanitarian goods would be allowed into Gaza.

The organizers, who were less concerned with getting aid to Gaza than creating a provocation, refused Israel's offer and set sail for the Mediterranean coast.

Given the security issues at play, Israel's right to self-defence overrode the activists' right to "demonstrate" against the Gaza blockade. That's not to say there aren't questions to be answered about the navy's preparations for the operation and whether other means were available to thwart the unfortunate outcome.

It's not easy being the only democracy in the Middle East. It's even harder when your neighbours would prefer that you disappear. The delicate balancing act will continue.

Praying for the peace of Jerusalem

The best time to understand Jerusalem is at 5 a.m. on Shavuot – the biblical harvest holiday – the Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost in Christian tradition, 50 days after Passover. Every year at that time, give or take an hour, Jews of all stripes, shapes, ages and denominations sleepily emerge from the all-night study sessions, toward the Old City.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

I first joined this procession almost 40 years ago, a few days after I arrived in Jerusalem as a student. In those days, I managed to stay awake, and as we progressed around corners, our small group joined by others. Dozens turned into hundreds, and nearing the Tower of David, thousands filled the narrow paths ascending Mount Zion. Going through Zion Gate and into the Jewish Quarter's alleyways, we turned a corner and the Temple Mount suddenly became visible. It was easy to imagine a similar scene more than 2,000 years ago.

At the first signs of sunrise, the Western Wall plaza is fully packed, as each group struggles – not always peacefully – to claim a space for morning prayers marking the giving of the Torah at Sinai. In the surround-sound cacophony, no one can hear a word, but this does not dampen the celebration.

In the future, however, if schemes such as the Jerusalem Old City Initiative gain traction, the Shavuot procession and other reflections of the restoration of Jewish rights in this most ancient Holy City will end. This messianic peace plan is based on "a special regime" for Jerusalem, to be run by an "outside administrator with international standing" – in other words, an unelected government with authority for security, access to holy sites, construction permits, archeology, and planning.

The key issue, of course, is security, and in this plan, an international force would replace the Israeli forces that guarantee the safety of Christians, Muslims and Jews in Jerusalem. If history is any guide, it is likely that within a few hours or days, Palestinians would resume assaults against Jews on their way to worship. The violence will escalate to sniper attacks, and the renewal of large-scale bombings in buses, coffee shops and schools. In response, the international force will do nothing, diplomats will huff and puff, while peace groups, the UN and their allies in NGOs will invent "Israeli provocations."

We have been here before. In 1948, the Jordanian army captured and occupied the Old City, and, along with the local Palestinians, destroyed and desecrated the remaining buildings in the Jewish Quarter, as well as the ancient cemetery on the Mount of Olives.

In 1949, Israel and Jordan signed a formal armistice agreement, in which the international community guaranteed free access to the sacred sites on the other side of the line. In reality, however, the terms were never honoured, and no Jew was allowed to visit or worship at the Western Wall or Temple Mount. The international community, including the major powers, the United Nations and the Vatican, remained silent. It was the 1967 war that allowed Jews to worship again in ancient Jerusalem and to rebuild the Jewish Quarter.

For these and other reasons, the Jerusalem Old City Initiative is a non-starter – another counter-productive plan based on ideology rather than an understanding of the realities on the ground. The main architect is Michael Bell, the ex-Canadian ambassador who served in Egypt, Jordan and Israel. Bell, a well-known Arabist with the standard allergy toward Israel, has been outspoken in attacking the Harper government's efforts to restore a principled approach in Canadian foreign policy. And Canadian taxpayer funds – largely allocated before 2006, when the Harper government took office – footed much of the bill.

In contrast, real progress toward peace, particularly in Jerusalem, starts with tolerance and education, necessary to counter the campaign that erases 3,000 years of Jewish history and makes the absurd allegation that Israel is "Judaizing" the city by reclaiming this heritage.

When this incitement ends, and Jews are able to access and pray at the Western Wall and other sacred sites without the need for security protection, peace will be possible.

The Kirshner File

The Netherlands has normalized ties with Israel

Sixty years after recognizing Israel and opening an embassy in Tel Aviv, the Netherlands' bilateral relationship with Israel, though solid and friendly on all fronts, has become infinitely more complex, yet normal, and appears to have lost its early emotional intensity and resonance.

Sheldon Kirshner in The Hague

"We've seen a decline in the emotions that Israel used to arouse in this country," Israel's ambassador, Harry Kney-Tal, said in a recent interview at the Israeli embassy in The Hague.

Wim Kortenoeven, a researcher and editor at the Centre for Information and Documentation on Israel, a pro-Israel lobbying group comparable to the Canada-Israel Committee, concurs.

"Before the Yom Kippur War, Israel's image was that of a peaceful country harassed by the Arabs," he explained. "Israel was a victim surrounded by enemies. It was compared to Holland facing the might of Spain during the 16th century. Israel could do no wrong. It was a simple black-and-white picture."

To staunch Dutch Protestants who identified with and viewed the Jewish state through the prism of the Bible, Israel was a special nation.

"It was a story of heroic Israelis," said Kortenoeven, a Christian. "The Dutch conquered the sea, the Israelis conquered the desert. The friendship was based on emotion rather than on facts."

But as Dutch society was secularized and the church lost some of its influence, Israel's lustre dimmed.

"People today are not as exposed to the church's religious connection to Israel as in the past," said Kney-Tal.

Israel's high standing in the Netherlands was also a function of guilt over the murder of 78 per cent of Dutch Jews during the Holocaust, the highest death rate in Nazi-occupied western Europe.

"There was a lot of Dutch collaboration with the Nazis," Kortenoeven noted.

Addressing this sensitive issue, Kney-Tal observed, "During the early years, there was a sense of guilt over the near destruction of the Jewish community."

This spirit came to the fore during the Six Day War, when Dutch military equipment reached Israel and pro-Israel public opinion in the Netherlands soared. After 1967, when the Soviet Union broke diplomatic relations with Israel, Dutch diplomats represented Israeli interests in Moscow.

"This [pro-Israel] feeling is now dissipating, going away" said Kney-Tal. "The tendency among younger people is to treat the Holocaust as a distant event."

In retrospect, the Yom Kippur War was a historic turning point, irretrievably altering the tone of Israel's relations with the Netherlands.

OPEC – the Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries – imposed an oil embargo on the United States and its NATO ally, the Netherlands, after both countries expressed verbal and material support for Israel.

Although the embargo lasted less than six months, it affected the Netherlands' economic interests, forcing car-less Sundays, for example.

The Netherlands was singled out for retribution for at least two reasons. Dutch cabinet ministers were vocal in proclaiming support for Israel, while Arab rage was heightened by the news that the Netherlands secretly delivered Centurion tank parts and munitions to Israel during its campaign to drive the Syrian army off the Golan Heights.

Stung by the Arab reaction, both the Dutch government and the media adopted what Kortenoeven describes as "an unsentimental" and "more critical" appraisal of Israel.

Kney-Tal agrees with this sober assessment.

"From the 1950s to the 1970s, Israel had a very positive image in the Netherlands. In recent years, the opposite. Criticism of Israel is on the rise. There is a perception that Israel is not doing the right thing."

The Yom Kippur War was not the only factor that affected Israel's image in the Netherlands, according to Kortenoeven.

Dutch views of Israel were shaken by the massacre of hundreds of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in Lebanon in 1982. The Phalange, a Lebanese Christian militia aligned with Israel during its invasion of Lebanon, carried out the killings under the very noses of the Israeli army.

"This had a deep impact on Dutch public opinion," said Kortenoeven."

Israel's image was further tarnished by the first and second Palestinian uprisings and by Israel's settlement policy in the territories.

These days, he said, the majority of Dutch people regard Israel as "the bully of the neighbourhood."

On a government-to-government bilateral level, however, Israel and the Netherlands continued to enjoy good relations.

Dutch intelligence provided Israel with progress reports about Iraq's French-built nuclear reactor. During the 1991 Gulf War, the Netherlands dispatched a battery of Patriot missiles to Israel, whose cities were bombarded by 39 Iraqi Scud missiles.

Bringing the situation right up to date, Kney-Tal called the Netherlands "one of the good guys" in the European Union. "It is one of the few countries in the EU that shows a great deal of understanding for Israel's predicament and supports the upgrading of Israel's ties with the EU."

He added, "The Netherlands is punching above its political weight when it comes to Israel."

Nonetheless, the Netherlands subscribes to and supports the common EU position on the Arab-Israeli conflict. Catherine Ashton, the EU's current foreign minister, has said that the Europeans favour a sovereign Palestinian state loosely based on the 1967 borders, with eastern Jerusalem as its capital city.

"I don't think the Netherlands will break with the EU consensus," said Kney-Tal, adding that the Netherlands opposes imposed solutions and diktats.

In formulating policy toward Israel, the Netherlands – a mercantile nation whose volume of trade with Israel was $4 billion in 2008, just behind Britain and Germany – always considers EU opinion and the position of the United States.

"The Netherlands manoeuvres between these two parameters," said Kney-Tal, Israel's former envoy to the European Union.

Like all 27 EU member states, the Netherlands considers Israeli settlements in the West Bank illegal under international law, as well as an obstacle to peace. It also objects to the route of Israel's security barrier, which juts into the West Bank.

When Israel invaded the Gaza Strip in 2009, the Netherlands voiced understanding. "It was understood that Israel could no longer tolerate rocket attacks, and that Israel had a right to defend itself," said Kney-Tal. Nevertheless, the Netherlands expressed concern about Palestinian civilian casualties.

The Netherlands has advised Israel to follow the recommendations of the UN Goldstone report, which concluded that Israel and Hamas committed war crimes and possibly crimes against humanity during the fighting.

By Kney-Tal's reckoning, the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel has had a "moderate" impact in the Netherlands. "It's not on the level of the BDS campaign in Britain."

The Netherlands has aligned itself with the EU on Iran's quest for a nuclear arsenal, said Kney-Tal.

Last December, the Europeans urged international action against Iran following its refusal to co-operate with the UN.

"The Netherlands will support, though not initiate, tough sanctions against Iran," said Kney-Tal.

Zareinu celebrates past, looks toward the future

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

For 20 years, Zareinu Educational Centre has been brightening the lives of children with special needs through its unique integrated approach to education.

"There's nothing like it," said Marlene Benlolo, who sends her five-year-old daughter, Rachel, to the school. "They help with absolutely everything you can imagine."

Rachel has a degenerative disease called Rett syndrome, which her mother described as similar to Parkinson's disease.

Benlolo said the prognosis was that Rachel would be in a wheelchair forever. She hated music and would become hysterical when people touched her.

But four years later, she dances and sings in her music therapy sessions, and tries to touch and kiss the therapists, Benlolo says.

She's even able to walk with assistance.

The school offers social workers, therapists from various backgrounds, and language and speech pathologists. It also brings Jewish education into the curriculum.

Teachers and therapists are integrated into the school, so both play a role in a child's education.

Preschool teacher Jill Fruitman said that walking into the classroom, it would be difficult to distinguish between teachers, therapists and volunteers.

Although the school is celebrating the 20-year milestone, it's laying the groundwork for the next generation in order to continue toward the goal of breaking down the barriers between children with and without special needs, said Randy Spiegel, Zareinu's executive director.

One of the challenges the school faces is the lack of a central location. Right now, students are at the Sephardic Kehila Centre at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue, while the administrative offices are near Dufferin Street and Finch Avenue.

Everything should be in the same place, Spiegel said. "That is the goal and objective."

But one big hurdle is the cost. The school already relies heavily on private donations, with an annual goal of about $2.5 million a year, Spiegel said.

It's not easy, he added, especially with the current economic situation, he said.

Despite the challenges, Zareinu has managed to find the money each year, said principal Mitch Parker, adding that it subsidizes the cost of educating the children, as well as the general expenses of operating the school.

It costs about $50,000 a year to educate a student in the program, and there are 68 children enrolled this year, he said. The families of full-time students are responsible for covering $29,500, and many families receive further subsidies.

The school also receives financial support from the provincial ministry of health and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

One reason people like to support the school is because it attracts some of the "top special needs educators and therapists," Spiegel said.

"They're the most supportive team you could ever imagine," Benlolo agreed.

She described a time when Rachel was suffering from severe seizures and was in the hospital. One of the therapists visited Rachel to help her eat, even though it was outside of school hours.

"She never asked us for a dime and never mentioned it to anybody," Benlolo said. "You can't get this anywhere else."

Fruitman said these actions are part of the general attitude among the staff.

"You have to give it your all," she said. "If you don't, you're never going to make it."

Zareinu's next fundraiser is its annual Moveathon, in which people can register to run, walk, or bicycle varying distances. The festival portion and shorter distances will take place June 13 at Downsview Park, and the longer rides will be on June 27.

Those interested in registering can do so at http://www.zareinu.org

Schwartz/Reisman Centre takes shape on York Region's Lebovic Campus

New facilities poised to transform Jewish life north of Steeles Avenue

By Barbra Green

Construction has kicked into high gear on the Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus – one of three centres of Jewish life in the GTA being transformed through UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign.

The current phase of development began in December 2009, and the progress that has been made to date is breathtaking. Already well underway at the corner of Bathurst Street and Lebovic Campus Drive are the incredible facilities that will house the Schwartz/Reisman Centre (SRC). This state-of-the-art, 100,000 sq. ft. JCC, slated to open in the summer of 2012, will be the heart and soul of Jewish life north of Steeles – a place of learning and exploration, arts and culture, and health and wellness for all members of our community.

The SRC's Phil Granovsky Sports and Recreation Pavilion will feature:

- A cutting-edge Fitness & Conditioning Centre with top-of-the-line cardiovascular and resistance training equipment
- Studios for aerobics, yoga and spinning
- An Indoor Aquatics Centre with a 25-metre Main Pool and Therapeutic Pool for seniors, children and those with special needs
- Spacious change room facilities for women, men and families
- Athletic and sports programs in the Sydney and Florence Cooper and Family Sports Hall already in use by TanenbaumCHAT at the Kimel Family Education Centre

The SRC's Children and Family Pavilion will feature:

- The Gorman Shore Goodman Childhood Education Centre
- Nine classrooms to accommodate over 160 daycare and preschool-age children
- The Goldstein Family Playground
- A Family Resource Centre
- A Community Arts Centre with studios for dance, ceramics, painting classes and more
- The Special Program Suite for Reena's adult day-program

Also under construction is the Community Services Pavilion, whose third floor will house the Mount Sinai Academic Family Health Team. Embodying the best in community-based health and wellness services, the centre will be staffed by a number of full-time general practitioner physicians, nurse practitioners, visiting specialists and other allied health care providers.

And at the heart of the complex will be the Sharp Family Atrium which will connect to the various pavilions and the Leo and Sala Goldhar Conference and Celebration Centre.

Together, these remarkable facilities are the second of several planned construction phases for the Lebovic Campus. The initial phase of development saw the opening of the Kimel Family Education Centre, the northern home of TanenbaumCHAT, in 2007.

For construction updates and more information, please visit LebovicCampus.com

Upon completion, the underground parking lot at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre will hold up to 350 vehicles.

Teens gather to choose new USY leaders

Compiled by CJN staff

Kadimaniks (grades 5-7) and USYers (grades 8-12) from the Eastern Canadian Region of United Synagogue Youth spent the May 27-30 weekend at The Wolfond Centre in Toronto for their annual USY spring regional convention.

USY is the high school affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism; Kadima is the middle school affiliate. Members attended from all of ECRUSY's chapters.

The four-day convention – the theme was battle of the sexes – included learning, social action, fun, and the election of the new regional executive board. Participants had the opportunity to explore stereotypes, attitudes, and text.

Kadimaniks examined the images of men and women through a lens of Disney princesses, creating their own songs in praise of the men and women in their families.

They also examined gender issues in Israel with young emissaries from Beth David Israel Beth Am Synagogue, Gal Meshoulam and Yuval Derry, who will soon be returning to Israel for their army service.

On Friday all participants participated in a battle of the sexes relay, doing stereotypical actions such as running in high heels and doing calisthenics.

New Board- The newly elected ECRUSY Regional Executive Board, from left, Emma Pascoe, Michaela Sadinsky, Joshua Seed, Ophira Calof, Sara Levine, and Jonah Eisen.

Social action and education are part of every convention, and USYers and Kadimaniks raised close to $800 for tzedakah.

On Sunday the convention participated in the UJA Walk With Israel, cheering and singing all the way. They were filmed by the CBC and for Israeli television.

The group wore Zareinu Educational Centre T-shirts to help publicize the Zareinu Moveathon, because Zareinu is one of the charities ECRUSY supports.

In addition to the activities directly related to the convention theme, there were late-night sessions examining prayers; Israeli films on YouTube, and community activities.

On Friday as well, convention delegates elected officers to the 2010-2011 ECRUSY regional executive board. Emma Pascoe of Beth David, Toronto was elected president, succeeding Sarah Goldberg of Beth Jacob, Hamilton.

Also elected were Israel affairs/executive vice-president Michaela Sadinsky, Agudath Israel, Ottawa; religion/education vice-president Joshua Seed, Beth David chapter; Toronto, social action/tikkun olam vice-president Ophira Calof, Agudath Israel, Ottawa; Sara Levine, Beth David, Toronto; and Jonah Eisen, Beth David, Toronto.

The chapter of the year award was presented to Agudath Israel, Ottawa. Or Shalom, London, won the Eitz Hayyim for most improved chapter; and Sara Levine, Beth David Chapter, Toronto won the Sharon Cole Memorial Merit scholarship for her service to ECRUSY.

Additional awards were awarded for social programming (Or Shalom, London), religion/education (Or Shalom, London), social action programming (Beth David, Toronto), highest tikkun olam raised (Beth David, Toronto), highest tikkun olam raised per capita (Beit Rayim, Toronto), communications (Shaar Shalom, Thornhill) and website (B'nai Israel, St. Catharines).

Convention co-chairs were David Segal and Benny Shilling, members of the Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill.

Israel hosts and toasts Premier Dalton McGuinty

By Shoshana Poznansky Israel.

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty recently completed a whirlwind trade mission to Israel, Ramallah and Bethlehem - the first Israel visit by an Ontario Premier since Mike Harris made the journey 12 years ago. His delegation of 40 including MPPs Mike Colle, Monte Kwinter and David Zimmer; two provincial cabinet ministers, Dr. Eric Hoskins, Trade & Economic Development and Dr. Eric Hoskins, Citizenship & Immigration; plus leaders from the fields of business and health sciences.

His trip took him to the Prime Minister's office for discussions with Benjamin Netanyahu, the President's residence for a meeting with Shimon Peres, Yad Vashem, the kotel (Western Wall) and the Eilat-Eilot area, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's partnership region.

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty is welcomed to Israel by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"We quickly discovered that while we live continents apart, we have different political circumstances, different histories, but when it comes to building an economy, we are actually on the same track, and we can and should do more together," said McGuinty after his talk with Netanyahu.

McGuinty's meeting with Peres focused on research and innovation in their growing knowledge-based economies. Inspired by Israel's model, McGuinty intends to appoint a chief scientist for the province of Ontario.

Ontario Premier visits desert blooming with alternative energy solutions

It may have been just one of 350 sunny days a year in Israel's southernmost Eilat-Eilot region, but for Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty it shed a lot of light on state-of-the-art models for alternative energy.

McGuinty flew to Israel's deep south where he visited the AORA solar tower in the Arava desert, 20 kms north of Eilat. Finding a rare shady spot, the Premier learned how this technology utilizes mirrors to reflect solar rays and in turn produce electricity.

"We have a lot to learn from Israeli scientists and entrepreneurs who have embraced the challenge of sustaining life in the challenging desert climate," said McGuinty.

Partnering with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for 22 years, the city of Eilat and surrounding region of Eilot have become leaders in the field of alternative and renewable energy, including the cutting-edge Centre for Renewable Energy and Energy Conservation at the Arava Institute.

"With help from the creative minds and financial support of UJA Toronto we are well on our way to turning this into the Silicon Valley for renewable energy," remarked Udi Gat, Mayor of the Eilot Regional Council.

The Premier toured the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies, a world-class research and development centre, which attracts brilliant minds from around the world to work together to find alternative environmental solutions. McGuinty met with faculty and addressed students participating in a UJA-supported environmental studies program, in cooperation with Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, with a campus in Eilat.

"We have a lot in common. But there are some differences. In Canada the land is large, our story is brief, here the land is small and your story is epic," McGuinty told the students who come from Jewish and Arab backgrounds.

The Arava Institute has embraced the subject of environment as a bridge to connect the diverse populations of the Middle East.

Premier McGuinty addressed students at the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies.

The Institute trains Arab and Jewish students, hailing from Israel, Jordan, the Palestinian territories and other parts of the world to work together on complex environmental issues.

"The world needs you. It needs your talents, your enthusiasm, your audacity, your creativity, your idealism, and your leadership," added McGuinty.

Bat Yam school visit introduces MPP's to innovative integration initiatives

With immigrants comprising nearly 40% of its population, Bat Yam is home to one of the most diverse communities in Israel. So it was here that four members of the Ontario Trade Mission came to experience firsthand how the city integrates newcomers, particularly those from Ethiopia.

Citizenship and Immigration Minister, Dr. Eric Hoskins, together with MPPs Mike Colle, Monte Kwinter, and David Zimmer, were welcomed to Bat Yam's Akiva Elementary School by students holding Canadian and Israeli flags.

At a meeting in the library, newly renovated in part by a gift from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the MPPs heard of the unique challenges faced by students.

"Most of the Jewish Ethiopian community came from a Third World country, from villages, not from the city. It is a community that with a four-hour flight, jumped more than 2,000 years – from houses made of mud to experiencing new technology, and this is a challenge," said Leah Biteloin, an Ethiopian immigrant herself, and Regional Director of the Jewish Agency. "All classes have a mix of students from different backgrounds, and it is because they learn together that they can become fully integrated."

MPPs Monte Kwinter, David Zimmer, Mike Colle and Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Dr. Eric Hoskins (back right) are greeted by students at Bat Yam Akiva Elementary School.

Two programs supported by UJA Federation facilitate integration. Youth Futures matches students and young adult mentors who work with the children to help close their learning and social gaps. Spaces-Mirchav also helps to shrink these gaps by providing students with enrichment and support through services such as extracurricular activities and hot lunches.

"What a privilege to be here. It is just remarkable to see these kids and how they are thriving, and they've got hope," said Dr. Hoskins. "They are facing their challenges and are growing up to be strong, productive human beings, regardless of where they are from. The partnership that UJA has established with this community is fabulous and the support that is being provided is making a very tangible difference in the lives of these kids."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

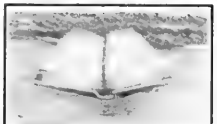
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Don't lose the personal touch

By RABBI MORDECAI E. ZEITZ



Rabbinic Reflections

Hachnassat Orchim, welcoming guests, is a mainstay of the Jewish People, hospitality the hallmark of Jewish life. Avraham and Sarah pitched their tent on the crossroads so that travellers could be cared for. Many families came to Canada as guests, sponsored by family or friends, and became part of the extended family. When people arrive from out of town, there is room in our homes. But a good guest knows when it's time to leave.

So what do you think of a guest who hangs around for over 50 years? Impossible you say. Well, consider the following – and I thank those who shared this with me.

"Awhile ago, my Dad met a stranger who was new to our town. Dad was fascinated with this newcomer and invited him to live with our family. The stranger was quickly accepted. As I grew up, I never questioned his place in my family. In my young mind, he had a special niche. He became our storyteller, keeping us spellbound for hours. If I wanted to know about politics, history or science, he knew the answers. He took my family to their first major league ball game. The stranger never stopped talking.

"Sometimes, Mom would get up quietly while the rest of us were listening and she would go to the kitchen for peace and quiet. I wonder now if she ever prayed for the stranger to leave.

"Dad ruled our household with certain moral convictions, but the stranger never felt obligated to honour them. Profanity, for example, was not allowed in our home. Our longtime visitor, however, got away with four-letter words that burned my ears and made my dad squirm and my mother blush. Dad didn't permit the liberal use of alcohol, but the stranger encouraged us to try it on a regular basis. He made cigarettes look cool, cigars manly. He talked freely about sex.

"I now know that my early concepts about relationships were influenced strongly by the stranger. He often opposed the values of my parents, yet he was never asked to leave.

"More than 50 years have passed since the stranger moved in with our family. He has blended right in and is not as fascinating as he was at first, but you will still find him sitting in his corner today.

"His name? We call him TV. He has a wife now. We call her Computer. Their first child is Cellphone, second is IPod, and the family is growing."

We are no strangers to technology and much good has accrued from its presence, but we have to realize how we opened the door and exposed ourselves to stuff so repugnant to our basic value system. While we might argue that we can control what will be watched or what websites are visited, the truth is, once connected, we lose control. I preach extreme caution but not abstinence.

The most severe damage done by our visitors has been the loss of the great gift of human interaction. I have seen people sitting together, deep in conversation, but with lips not moving. They are texting or twittering. As connected as we think we are, we have become a generation of strangers, estranged from the art of personal contact.

If God hadn't thought of it first, I would have declared the need for at least one day a week to be gadgetless, with communication by personal interaction only. What a novel idea!

We have it. It's called Shabbat – no stranger at all. It puts "human" back into "humanity," and it's what our world desperately needs. Take in some real live guests for Shabbat and put the intruders to rest for the day. Even more, why not put a little Shabbat personal touch into the other days of the week as well?

Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz is the spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Tikvah Ahavat Shalom Nusach Hoari in Montreal.

Judaism and astrology

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

Recently, a good friend, enthusiastic about astrology, asked if he could chart my horoscope. I told him that I wasn't interested. He countered indignantly, "Astrology is a vital part of Judaism."

It is true that the majority of talmudic sages believed in the decisive role played by celestial bodies in determining human events. Rabbi Joshua ben Levi, one of the outstanding Palestinian sages of the first half of the third century, posited a horoscope for the days of the week: the Sunday child will be distinguished; Monday's wrathful; Tuesday's wealthy and sensual; Wednesday's intelligent and enlightened; Thursday's benevolent; Friday's pious; while those born on Saturday tend to die on that day.

Rabbi Hanina, however, told his students: "Go to the son of Levi and tell him that the fate of a person is not decided by the constellations of the day, but by those of the hour."

What of the difficult theological implications of all of this? Is man but the puppet of forces above him? Is it true as ignoble Edmund in King Lear puts it: "We were villains of necessity, fools by heavenly compulsion, knaves, thieves and treachers by spherical predominance, drunkards, liars and adulterers by an enforced obedience of planetary influences, and all that we are evil is by a divine thrusting on."

How can we reconcile such views with the religious teachings of free will as the premise of reward and punishment? All of this led to Rabbi Yohanan's statement, "Ein mazal leyisrael – Israel is not subject to the signs of the zodiac." The influence of the stars meets their match in piety, which can cancel out the pull of the constellations.

In the Middle Ages, many respected rabbis, commentators and ethical teachers studied astrology and were favourably disposed toward it.

Maimonides, however, basing himself on the biblical passage, "Ye shall not observe times" (Leviticus 19:26), declared that belief in the influence of the stars on human events is "deserving of flagellation." To those who had come under the sway of astrology, he addressed his "Letter to the Men of Marseilles," denouncing the wisdom of the Babylonians as "a disease, not a science, a tree under the shadow of which all sorts of superstitions thrive, and which must be uprooted in order to give way to the tree of knowledge and the tree of life."

Maimonides could not abide what he considered superstition and ignored numerous talmudic and midrashic opinions that authenticate it.

The Shulchan Aruch, the traditional compendium of Jewish law and observance, concludes that astrology must neither be uncritically accepted nor completely disregarded. It suggests that marriages should not be conducted in days of the moon's decline. New projects should not be started on the second or fourth day of the week. That which man knows is against the "advise of the stars" should be avoided. To place confidence in the zodiac is forbidden, but to ignore its warning is to be foolhardy.

In Judaism today, the only reference to astrology is "mazal tov," the expression of good wishes that literally conveys the hope of a good constellation. All being said, the midrash provides good advice: "The stars rule men, but God rules the stars."

Jewish Life

Hot books for warm weather

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

As the weather turns warmer, the minds of many turn toward… books (OK, allow me my illusions). This summer's reading list of Jewish books begins with Women and Men in Communal Prayer. Halakhic Perspectives, which reflects on changes in some Orthodox communities with respect to the role of women in communal prayer. Questions dealing with the rights of women to receive aliyot, to layn from the Torah and to lead parts of the service are all examined here by a variety of scholars. Essays that advocate for the necessity and propriety of such changes are to be found here in the form of contributions by Tamar Ross and Daniel Sperber. Those opposed to the scope and swiftness of these developments also are given voice here in essays by Rabbi Shlomo Riskin and Rabbi Eliav Shochetman. An important volume on a topic of growing interest in traditional Jewish quarters.

And as the interface between feminism and Judaism continues to trigger controversy in the Orthodox world, books are naturally being produced that mirror these trends. Tova Hartman, daughter of Rabbi David Hartman – who is still remembered in Montreal from his time as a pulpit rabbi there – offers a candid analysis of this confrontation in her 2007 book Judaism Encounters Traditional Judaism. The book is a lucid and intelligent critique of a number of lingering patriarchal attitudes encoded both in Jewish law and the sociology of Jewish communities, and also recalls her struggles with getting a synagogue off the ground that would serve her needs as a contemporary Orthodox Jewish woman, a struggle that eventually leads to the founding of the well-known Shira Hadashah in Jerusalem.

The Murmuring Deep by Avivah Gottlieb Zornberg continues in the vein of her early works of biblical commentary and analysis. Some of Zornberg's thematic explications are breathtaking in their creativity, but at other times, the prose gets impeded by too many intertextual allusions that don't necessarily add to the lucidity of the argument. Still, this work, like the books on Genesis and Exodus, more often than not opens up fresh and enlightening ways of reading the text, and for that, much gratitude is in order.

The prolific Avi Sagi, who teaches in the department of philosophy at Bar-Ilan University, published yet another book in 2009. Jewish Religion after Theology is an extremely thoughtful look at issues of postmodern belief and pluralistic possibilities in contemporary Judaism. The crux question of how to practise religion in an age where faith has undergone so many withering assaults from so many quarters is redeveloped in this book in fresh and meaningful ways.

Lastly, the journalist Chris Hedges offered perhaps the biggest wake-up call of the year in his blistering screed Empire of Illusion: The End of Literacy and the Triumph of Spectacle. The book examines how the West has slowly devolved into cults of celebrity and illusion, with wrestling, pornography, political campaigns and various other cultural phenomena held up as metaphors for the rapid decline of serious thought. Hedges, who is not Jewish and somewhat anti-Zionist, is unrelentingly gloomy but, alas, often right.

Yiddishe papas and Father's Day

A few weeks ago, there was a run on flower stores across the country as mothers, including Yiddishe mamas, got their day in the sun. In just over a week, fathers everywhere will unwrap boxes with ties and open up new bottles of cologne. That means it's time to give Yiddishe papas their due.

Long before Father's Day was first observed, Jewish children were commanded to honour and fear their parents. Rabbi Michael Gold explains the importance of the well-known mitzvah of honouring your father. As to whether Judaism requires them to obey their parents, you'll have to read the essay. [http://bit.ly/jdad01]

On the other hand, here are some responsibilities the rabbis have placed on the broad shoulders of Jewish fathers.

• A father should be careful to keep his son from lies, and he should always keep his word to his children. (Talmud Sukkah 46b)

• A father must provide his daughter with appropriate clothing and a dowry. (Code of Jewish Law, Even haEzer 71)

• A father once complained to the Baal Shem Tov that his son was forsaking Judaism and morality. He asked the rabbi what he could do. The Baal Shem Tov answered: "Love him more." (Chassidic Tale) [http://bit.ly/jdad03]

Rabbi Bruce Dollin quotes the famous statement that a Jewish father is "bound regarding his son to circumcise him, redeem him, teach him Torah, take a wife for him and teach him a craft. Some say, to teach him to swim as well." Nowadays, Jewish fathers have delegated most of those responsibilities to others. But Rabbi Dollin says the statement points to deeper truths. "Maybe teaching our children to swim is really a metaphor. Fathers are obligated to show their children how to swim, perhaps, in the sea of life. Fathers serve as a model of how to enjoy life's blessings when the seas are calm, and how to work through the hard times when life's inevitable storms arrive." [http://bit.ly/jdad04]

I have come across several moving essays in which Jewish children remember their fathers. My recommendations follow.

• A Story of Jewish Fathers, Angels and Poinsettias by Sara Levinsky Rigler. [http://bit.ly/jdad05]

• A Face in the Window, in which Rabbi Yaakov Salomon remembers his teary father peering through the window of his summer camp bus just so that he could savour one more glimpse of his son: [http://bit.ly/jdad10]

• A look at two very different Jewish fathers of famous writers, Philip Roth and Calvin Trillin. [http://bit.ly/jdad02] (Free registration is required to read entire essay.)

In Honouring Our Fathers, Rabbi Daniel Brenner has these thoughts for observing Father's Day Jewishly. "On Father's Day, we honour our fathers not by comparing them to some ideal but by acknowledging them for who they really are. We pause to reflect on their history, remember the challenges they faced, and meditate on what they taught us along the way. In that, we truly live by the words, 'Honour thy Father.'" [http://bit.ly/jdad08]

Every family has its own challenges, and sometimes work is needed to repair longstanding rifts. In a classic Simpsons episode, Krusty, the town's (Jewish) clown, tells how he became estranged from his father, the rabbi, when the son didn't go into the family business. (Think The Jazz Singer but with clowns.) By the end of the episode, Bart and Lisa successfully nudge father and son together when Krusty sings a classic song to his father. [http://bit.ly/jdad09]

Krusty: Oh Mein Papa, to me he was so wonderful, Oh Mein Papa, to me he was so good, no one could be, so gentle and so loveable, Oh Mein Papa he always understood!

Rabbi Krustofsky: Oh I love you son.

Krusty: I love you, too, daddy.

Whereupon, Bart hands Rabbi Krustofsky a cream pie that he throws in Krusty's face. They embrace and laughter ensues.

Happy Father's Day.

The real disproportionate response

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

At the time this column was being written, on the evening of June 2, the popular news aggregator Google showed close to 18,000 items on Israel's May 31 military operation to prevent a flotilla from breaking its naval blockade of Gaza.

Google's compilation of reports from around the globe on this operation exceeded by far the attention devoted to any other event or even combination of events. If anything, the number of items concerning Israel only seemed to grow by the hour. The appetite for this story appeared to be insatiable. And the mood was overwhelmingly negative – highly critical of Israel for daring to intercept, in international waters, ships on a "humanitarian" mission, and for killing nine activists aboard one ship who "resisted" the seizure.

Indeed, more than any other factor, the tragic deaths of these civilians sparked an immediate visceral reaction against Israel that all but obliterated Israel's legitimate case for having undertaken the operation in the first place.

There were, of course, exceptions to this pattern of coverage. For instance, the National Post's May 31 editorial placed Israel's interception in the context of the international embargo to stop weapons from entering Hamas-run Gaza. The Post was faithful in presenting the basic facts that many have glossed over: that members of the flotilla swarmed and violently attacked Israeli commandos, and represented an organization, the IHH, with established ties to Islamic extremists.

However, as the Post wrote: "For most of the world, of course, these facts won't matter: Like the bogus Jenin massacre, this episode will be used as just another stick to beat the Jewish state – even by those same pundits and activists who can't be roused to say a single word when genuine "massacres" unfold in other parts of the world, such as the slaughter of more than 90 members of the Ahmadi sect in Pakistan."

Though critical of Israel's actions as a "disproportionate" reaction to the provocation that the flotilla presented, the Globe and Mail's June 1 editorial implied that Israel fell into a trap that provided "a propaganda victory for Israel's enemies, [and] has made the country vulnerable to international condemnation." Yet the Globe failed to note the irony that the international condemnation (which indeed came fast and furiously) was itself grossly disproportionate to Israel's actions.

As Leslie Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations, observed (The Daily Beast, May 31): "Well, where was all that international outrage and demand for explanations and retribution when the North Koreans sunk a South Korean ship? Where was it when the Gazans attacked Israel?... This international outrage is highly selective, isn't it?"

On the issue of the blockade itself, there's a widespread and persistent impression that Gaza is under total siege and closure. Even the Globe's editorial, while accurately noting that the closure has been imposed by both Israel and Egypt, claimed that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "will now need to explain to the international community why the Israeli military was preventing basic food supplies [carried on the ships] from reaching Gaza's people."

In fact, Israel repeatedly offered to allow the ships to dock at its port in Ashdod, from where the food supplies would be transported by truck to border crossings at the Gaza Strip. The flotilla organizers, however, rejected that offer out of hand, even brazenly declaring their real aim all along – to create a confrontation with the Israeli navy in order to "break" the blockade. Still, despite the flotilla's provocation, Israel fulfilled its pledge once the ships were brought into port, delivering the ship's cargo to Gaza after inspection.

Then again, as Israeli authorities explained, the ships' humanitarian supplies weren't needed, since, on a weekly basis, Israel provides about 15 tons of food and medicine to the people of Gaza. And that's in addition to all the supplies (including not just food, but also arms and rockets) being smuggled into Gaza through hundreds of tunnels at the Gaza-Egypt border. This is not meant to minimize the difficulties many people in Gaza face on a daily basis, but surely the responsibility rests with an extremist regime far more committed to Israel's destruction than it is to ensuring the well-being of its own population.

Chassidic school vows to fight gov't closure

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A chassidic community is digging in its heels for a long legal battle, if necessary, to stop the Quebec government from closing one of its schools.

In April, the justice department obtained a court injunction to shut down the Toras Moshe Academy, a boys' elementary school under Satmar auspices, because it doesn't conform to the law.

Toras Moshe was among a half-dozen Orthodox schools that have been in talks with Education Minister Michelle Courchesne for more than two years to try to find a way for them to meet the requirements of the Education Act.

The ministry has found that Toras Moshe doesn't have a permit, that many of its teachers are unlicensed and, of most concern, that it's not teaching enough secular subjects or devoting enough time to those that it does teach. The law also requires that all children be in school full time from ages six to 16.

The case is scheduled to be heard Oct. 25 in Quebec Superior Court.

Alex Werzberger, a leader of the Satmar community, as well as president of the Coalition of Outremont Chassidic Organizations, told The CJN that the ministry's findings are true, but that the community will fight for the right to maintain its traditional way of teaching its children.

Werzberger pointed out that the school has been in existence for almost 60 years and that he was in its first class in 1951-52, and that it has never sought or taken any government funding.

"When we opened there was no education department [it was created in 1964]. We have been cruising along all this time. Nobody asked us if we had a permit, or told us we needed a permit," he said.

That was until 2006, when the media began to investigate the legality of the Orthodox Jewish schools, finding evidence that some were not in conformity, forcing the government to act.

As for the qualifications of its teachers, Werzberger said it's difficult to find licensed ones – that is, with a college teaching degree. Toras Moshe doesn't hire non-Jewish teachers or women.

The approximately 200 students get basic instruction in the English and French languages and math and "a little" geography or history, Werzberger said. Science, except what can be derived from the Talmud, isn't taught, he said.

As for the compulsory Ethics and Religious Culture course introduced last year by the province, which is designed to impart a basic knowledge of major religions, Werzberger said, "they are absolutely not going to learn it."

The greater part of the students' time is devoted to Jewish studies, in Yiddish and Hebrew.

Werzberger insisted that is not going to change, and that the community has responded to the government to that effect.

First of all, he believes the school hours could not be extended to the degree necessary to meet the province's prescribed curriculum. Elementary children in Quebec must spend a minimum of 22 to 25 hours of instruction a week in the classroom, he said.

Most of students' time devoted to Jewish studies

"Because there are no secular studies on Friday and on Shabbat, that would mean four or 4-1/2 hours a day of secular studies. As it is, students as young as eight- and nine-year-olds are at school from 7 a.m until 5, 6 or 7 in the evening. We would have to add two more hours for secular studies or cut the religious studies, which we are not going to do."

The school, located on Casgrain Street in Mile End, is providing the boys with enough secular education for their needs, he said. The Talmud offers a broad education, he pointed out, not only religious teachings.

"A lot that is taught [in the prescribed curriculum] is available in the Talmud. We don't think it is necessary to have more. We think we are giving them the proper foundation for life," Werzberger said.

"They don't have to read Greek mythology or Shakespeare. The Talmud broadens the mind more than Shakespeare."

Werzberger said he's confident that the boys coming out of Toras Moshe are as well, if not better, educated than those in public schools. All seven of his sons went through the school, he said, and are doing well.

"There is nowhere in the world, to my knowledge, where there are such stringent requirements [on education] as in Quebec," he said.

The Satmar community has already closed its high school in Montreal. Most of those leaving Toras Moshe continue studying later in New York or Israel, he said.

New York state, he said, recognizes talmudic studies as credit for higher education. His own sons have careers in speech therapy and computer programming, for example.

There is a girls' Satmar school in the city, and Werzberger said it isn't affected by the government action. Because they take less religious studies, the girls are receiving more secular education, he said.

"There are certain winds blowing in this province that are anti-religious. I won't say anti-Jewish or anti-Semitic, [because] everyone is in the same boat…This is a very uncertain and unhappy time."

The Fountains 'sets a new standard in condo living'

There is much to fall in love with in the city of Vaughan, the city above Toronto.

Mere minutes from downtown Toronto, communities north of Steeles Avenue, including Vaughan, have enjoyed a tremendous boom in recent years.

With an abundance of green spaces, a variety of local entertainment and leisure options, a myriad of stores, boutiques, restaurants, bars and cafés, and a variety of single family residential developments and cutting-edge condominium projects, Vaughan and its neighbourhoods, such as Thornhill, are considered among the best places to live, work and play anywhere in the GTA.

"The 905 is a dynamic, vibrant part of the Greater Toronto Area," says Shawn Richardson of Liberty Development, an award-winning condominium developer specializing in residential and mixed-use master planned communities in Markham, Vaughan, Richmond Hill and Thornhill and other GTA neighbourhoods.

Among Liberty's most successful projects are the celebrated Markham Centre and Liberty Square; the highly successful World on Yonge mixed use development; and the Thornhill City Centre, a condominium community on Bathurst Street just south of the 407 Highway.

"Thornhill City Centre is one of the 905's most ambitious residential developments, on one of its best locations," says Shawn Richardson. "Just north of the Promenade Centre and the dynamic new commercial developments along Centre Street, Thornhill City Centre is a multi-phased 25-acre residential development that includes the city of Vaughan's first urban park – a five-acre green space called Thornhill Green.

The Fountains at Thornhill City Centre

"Surrounding the park is a residential community that boasts 61 elegant townhomes and approximately 1,300 suites in six condominium buildings. That number, however, is set to rise with the release of our next residential opportunity, an 18-storey contemporary condo tower called The Fountains at Thornhill City Centre."

Designed by architect Cliff Korman of Kirkor Architects, The Fountains will offer well-designed, livable and elegantly appointed suites that range in size from 565 square feet to 1,200 square feet. Each suite will feature designer-inspired standard finishes, including laminate flooring throughout the living and dining areas, nine-foot ceiling heights and expansive balconies. All units offer a custom gourmet kitchen that includes granite slab countertops, stainless steel appliances, and European designed cabinetry. The master ensuites will boast marble countertops, deep soaker tubs and contemporary white fixtures.

Amenities at The Fountains will include a state-of-the-art fitness facility featuring a fully equipped training gym, an indoor pool and whirlpool, his and her change rooms, and sauna. Other features and amenities include a media screening room, billiards room, party room and an indoor golf simulator.

The Fountains at Thornhill City Centre is located just minutes from public transit via VIVA, York Region Transit and the TTC. With convenient access to public transit, getting around the region will be easy, while The Fountains' proximity to highways 407, 400 and the 404 will make it easy to get just about anywhere in the GTA.

"From our unsurpassed location, high-level finishes and our dynamic lifestyle features, The Fountains sets a new standard in condo living – not just for the 905, but for the GTA, too," says Richardson. "We think The Fountains will make quite a splash in today's condo market."

For more information about The Fountains, call 905-731-8302. The presentation centre is at at 7890 Bathurst St. www.thefountaincondos.com.

Students urged to open dialogue about flotilla issue

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Students must find a voice in the online community, said Shimon Fogel last week during a conference call about Israel's raid on a Turkish flotilla.

Fogel, the chief executive of the Canada-Israel Committee, spoke to more than 50 Canadian students during the call, which was organized by the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS).

"It's important for individuals within the pro-Israel community to connect with local communities," he said, adding that blogs and social media are a crucial tool in countering misinformation and lies about the flotilla, which was bringing aid to the Gaza Strip.

"Social media has become a critically important dimension... the one [voice] that you have can bring an echo."

Fogel replaced Ofir Gendelman, Israel's spokesperson to the Arab media, who was supposed to speak, but had to attend an emergency meeting about another flotilla heading toward Israel.

Rebecca Cherniak, the incoming vice-president internal of CFJS and a student at McMaster University, stressed the importance of supporting Israel through social network sites and the Internet.

"The battle that we can provide the most support for is the online battle, the blogosphere, Twitter, Facebook... students are mavens with the Internet, and it's such a useful tool to spread the message."

With so much media attention on the event, Cherniak said many students were getting conflicting information, something she hoped Fogel could address during the conference call, which allowed students from all over Canada to dial in and participate.

"The main question students [have]... is what happened here," she said.

While answering this question, Fogel discussed Palestinian aid, explaining that, while Palestinians are entitled to international aid, Israel has a responsibility to inspect the contents of all flotillas.

"Over 15,000 tons of humanitarian aid makes its way into Gaza each week through Israeli land crossings," he said. "Aid has been loaded, for example, in European ports and has been inspected there, and it turns out not to be what's stamped on the burlap sack. So you get shiploads of sugar that turns out to be chemicals used in the productions of warheads."

This is what Israel is targeting, Fogel told students.

"It's not about rice or wheat or sugar. It's about cement or rebar [reinforcing steel] or all the other material needed by Hamas to rebuild fortified bunkers to relaunch... missiles," he said.

When asked why Israeli soldiers didn't use police weapons that would have done less damage, Fogel said that, in retrospect, commanders may have acted differently "with the benefit of the knowledge they have now," adding that they initially approached with paintball guns and didn't expect to use any weapons.

Jay Solomon, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA)'s manager of campus advocacy, said that students have been particularly active in finding information about the flotilla.

Solomon added that the discussion put the flotilla issue in context and provided background information.

"That's often missing in discussions of this nature," said Solomon, who worked with CFJS to organize the conference call.

"Students... are the leaders on campus but they're also the leaders of tomorrow. It's important that the students understand the facts and how what they're seeing on the news may or may not be what actually happened."

Federal government worker claims human rights victory

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A federal government employee who claimed her work environment at Passport Canada was rife with anti-Semitism has won a human rights victory.

A May 18 ruling by federal adjudicator Michele Pineau of the Public Service Labour Relations Board found that Valery LaBranche's colleagues discriminated against her because she would leave work early on Fridays to observe Shabbat and took off Jewish holidays, and that supervisors in her office did little to help her.

LaBranche, who converted to Judaism in 1997, said she had been deeply traumatized by her treatment, had to seek medical treatment and take time off work. She launched her grievance in January 2007.

LaBranche, who had been seconded to Passport Canada from the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT) in October 2005, made arrangements with her supervisor to accommodate her religious requirements, in particular that she would leave early on Fridays and take time off for Jewish holidays. It was understood that she would make up the time taken for such religious observances, which she did.

According to Pineau's ruling, the problems began when a new administrative assistant was hired in LaBranche's area. She took issue with what she deemed special arrangements, questioned LaBranche about extending a business trip abroad for one day to avoid travelling home on Shabbat (for which permission had been granted in advance) and began requiring LaBranche to complete forms for each time she was absent from work.

In addition, this new assistant made comments to LaBranche about her manner of dress, complaining that LaBranche was not participating in "dress-down Fridays" and not accompanying co-workers to "outings to restaurants."

The situation escalated from unpleasant to threatening when, beginning in December 2006, three anonymous anti-Semitic messages were sent to LaBranche's superiors. The first one read "Be aware of Mrs. LaBranche. She is a Mossad agent." The second, "The Jew sucks your blood. Don't fall into her trap. You will make her go swiftly or we will make her go slowly and painfully! It's your choice!!!"

A third message arrived in the form of a lengthy and very disturbing e-mail that was sent via the New York Post website NYPOST.com. Although the information contained in the e-mail indicated that it was sent by someone in LaBranche's workplace, investigations by the RCMP, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) and DFAIT were unable to determine who had written it.

LaBranche's superiors didn't immediately make her aware of these messages, but when they did, she was extremely upset, leading her to take time off from work. To her dismay, CSIS actually investigated her rather than the e-mail because, she said, CSIS does not have a mandate to investigate letters or e-mails, it has a mandate to investigate loyalty to the country. Because of the note accusing her of being a Mossad agent, CSIS investigated her loyalty to Canada.

An internal grievance against her department was rejected by the federal government, so LaBranche then took her case to adjudication by the Public Service Labour Relations Board.

"As an observant Jew, she did not own clothing in keeping with dress-down Fridays," Pineau wrote. She also noted that LaBranche's dietary restrictions precluded her from participating in outings to restaurants. Pineau found in favour of LaBranche, allowing the grievance and declaring the employer in breach of its obligations. She ordered that LaBranche be compensated for pain and suffering and gave the parties 60 days from the date of her decision to come to an agreement about the amount.

LaBranche has not spoken publicly about her ordeal and said she won't do so now, as she is still employed by the federal government. "I would be pleased to give you an interview, because I have a lot of things to say, but I will refrain from doing so," she said.

"It has been a very difficult four years for me and my family, and I am very happy with the outcome."

Que. supports inquiry into Israeli raid

MONTREAL — The Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) has asked the National Assembly to denounce opposition MNA Amir Khadir's "slander of the Jewish community" in the legislature and at a later press conference on June 1.

The QIC condemned "most vigorously" his accusation that the "lobby" is muzzling the Quebec government to prevent it from forcefully condemning Israel for last week's raid on the flotilla headed for Gaza. Khadir suggested that the government is under the sway of supporters of the Israeli political right and military.

סיפור שיכול לקרות רק בישראל

דביר עמנואלוב היה החייל הראשון שנתרגז בעזה במלחמת "עופרת יצוקה". אביו נפטר שנתיים קודם מכולה מכאיר, ודביר,בן היחיד בין בנות, נשא את כל השל יחד עם דליה, האמא שלו. האבדן הנורא גרם לצער גדול במיוחד, בשל היותו בן יחיד ובוגר רק בשנות המשפחה. בימים הלילות האחרון, האשכול המברים והמשפחה, הביאו שתילי פרחים וסדרי חלקת קבר יפה לזכרו... . במהלך האירוע הזה סיפרה דליה לכולם סיפור מזהים: לילה אחד, לפני שהלכה לישון, היא דיברה אל הקב"ה בסגל רס: "תן לי סימן, תן לי חיבוק אחד מדביר שלי כדי שאדע שלא הכל היה לשווא" והלכה לישון. באותו שבת, ביקשה מפנה דבת שלה לבוא איתה ל"חצות היהני" בירושלים – שם היתה אמורה להתקיים הופעה של מאיר בנאי. דליה האם לא כ"כ רצתה, הרגישה במצב רוח מאוד שפוף ועצוב , כולל עמדה באוטו שלה אבל גם לא רצתה לצער את ביתה ולכן נאתה, והלכה איתה בלי הרבה שמחה וחשק. המופע התקיים בחריכת הסלמון, ובעוד הצנים מתמהמהים לסדן את הכלים שלהם והתופעה מתפכחת, ניגש אליה ילדון קטן בן שנתיים, וחיבב הלולים שניראה כמו מלאך הגע בכתפה. דליה, שהיא נוטת במקצועה, סובבה את ראשה, ראתה את פני המלאך הבבטה עמד לשיחה: איך קוראים לך?-אשל. -אתה רוצה להיות חבר שלי? כן. והחרים -שתי שורות מעל- צוחים במלאך שלהם 'מטריד' את הנברת המבוגרת וקראים לו לחזור אליהם מיד, והיא, דליה, מרגישה ואומרת שהכל בסדר. ואז אשל המלאך הקטן מסיפר לה בשמחה שיש לו את הינוק שישמו דביר, שהוא שוכב בעגלה ויוכך חלב מאמא וביכה כל לילה שעות . מהתלולות מהשם, שלה דליה עם אשל הקט שתי שורות אל התורים ושם היא רואה את התינוק בעגלה- ואומרת להם בהצי התנבלות:-אם לא אכפת לכם שאני שואלת, בן כמה הבן שלכם?- בן חצי שנה.-רשום, אם זה בסדר שאני מתפעת, הוא בילד לפני או אחרי מלחמת "עופרת יצוקה"? אחרי.....ושלישה באמת, שאלה אחרונה,מדוע קראתם לו דביר?....ואמו של דביר מספרת:

"אני קצינת נפגעים בצה"ל, כשהייתי בסוף ההריון עם דביר הרופאים חשדו שגילו פרט מאוד קשה בבדיקת אולטרסאונד שיברי, אבל כיון שזה היה מעט בסוף ההריון כבר לא היה ניתן לעשות כלום אלא להמתין ללידה ולראות האם באמת יש פרט או לא. וכך, האמא -שידי- הלכה הביתה אחרי הבדיקה ובבית

Coast to Coast

Tamir marks 25 years

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — When Lily Penso faced a personal, family dilemma of how to provide care for her developmentally disabled teenage son, she had no idea where it would lead her.

Michael's future was uncertain, but his mother was determined that he would receive quality care in a warm and loving environment – and, most importantly, that he would be able to live his life Jewishly.

No such facility existed in Ottawa 25 years ago, but Penso was undeterred. With no experience and no resources, she embarked on a project that would not only change Michael's life, but the lives of hundreds of others, as she almost single-handedly changed the face of care in Ottawa.

In the beginning, with money raised through bake sales and bingos and private financing, Penso and a small group of like-minded volunteers founded Tamir and rented a townhouse that housed Michael and two others.

For five years, she continued relentlessly to seek financing, and in 1990, she was successful. Government funding enabled Tamir to grow and expand, which it has, continuously, until today.

The story of Tamir's beginning is just the first of the "miracles" for this organization, which today serves more than 100 people through 12 programs offered by more than 100 staff, and has an annual budget exceeding $6 million.

There are several group homes; supported independent living for semi-independent individuals; a time-share program that provides respite for family caregivers; a day program that offers recreational and leisure activities, and a program to help people find employment.

Considering that one of the main objectives of Tamir's initial families was that participants be able to live fully Jewish lives, Tamir's Judaic outreach program is perhaps its most exciting component.

According to Mark Palmer, Tamir's executive director, the Judaic outreach program has been recognized among Jewish developmental service organizations as "second to none in North America."

Under the leadership of Cantor Daniel Benlolo, Tamir participants have a variety of opportunities to live Jewish lives, including group Shabbat dinners and holiday celebrations, bar and bat mitzvahs and regular participation in synagogue services.

In 2002, Benlolo founded the Tamir Neshama Choir, with the motto "A Small Choir with a Big Heart," which has grown to 20 performers with a large, eclectic repertoire. The choir performs regularly at various events, has travelled to Montreal, Toronto and Boca Raton, Fla., and has even recorded a CD.

THIS WOULD JUST BE A MUSEUM.
BUT THIS IS THE SHRINE OF THE BOOK
It's the only place in the world you can see the Dead Sea Scrolls – the oldest Hebrew Bible and a great archaeological treasure. Then you can travel to the caves where they were found by shepherds just 50 years ago. It's yet another piece of our heritage in this most ancient and modern of lands. Come home to Israel, where the history that makes us who we are still lives.

Retirement vacationing, Israel style

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Turns out you can beat a good game of shuffleboard.

Seniors looking for new, adventure-filled activities may want to consider joining the Canadian-American Active Retirees in Israel (CAARI) program.

Run under the auspices of the JNF, the program was started in 1983 for people in the 50-plus demographic who remain physically active and are looking for ways to explore and connect with Israel.

On a promotional trip to Toronto last week, Susan Horwitz, CAARI's U.S.-based program director, told The CJN that since its inception, more than 2,000 retirees have participated on the annual, customizable trip to Israel.

CAARI helps seniors connect with Israel

Horwitz said the main elements of the program include participants doing community service, touring, a speakers' forum, helping with JNF forest work and attending special events.

Participants can choose to spend from two to seven weeks in Israel on the trip.

Commenting on the community service aspect, Horwitz said many trip-members volunteer to help teach English to children in low-income neighbourhoods. They also work in rehabilitation centres across the country and in orchards picking fruit destined for Israeli food banks.

CAARI also helps "bridge relations" between Arab and Jewish communities, she said, citing work that was done on this year's trip – which took place from January to March – on an archaeological community project in the city of Lod.

And of course, they help plant trees.

"This year, we handed out nearly 10,000 saplings to families," Horwitz said.

The average age range of participants is between 67 and 72 "but it varies through the years," she said.

Every year, about half the people on the CAARI trip are on their first visit to Israel.

"Most of them are amazed at how they can walk around [Israel] freely," Horwitz said. "We follow the footprint of JNF [historical and modern projects], and I try to go off the beaten path to keep changing the trip."

CAARI's Canadian co-chairs, Anice and Arnold Stark, said the experience is unlike any other.

"I don't care where you've [vacationed] in the world, this is a different trip," Anice said.

Arnold echoed her sentiments:

"Whenever we go, getting off the plane feels like you're standing in a little bit of home."

CAARI's next trip is scheduled for Jan. 9 to Feb. 25, 2011.

According to the organization's website, prospective participants must "be able to walk up to a half-mile or more and climb approximately 50 steps. They must be able to get on and off a bus unaided, [and] medical approval from a licensed physician is a requirement."

For more information, Horwitz suggested contacting your local JNF office.

Age is only a number, 100-year-old says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Turning 100 is not a big deal to Ruth Lederman.

"To tell you the truth, I don't really believe it," she said in an interview in her Thornhill condominium.

With her hair neatly done, and wearing beads and a Lacoste sweater draped over her shoulders, Lederman added, "but of course I'm happy. I'm always happy."

Ruth Lederman

Born in Iwaniska, Poland, in 1910, Lederman came to Canada in 1934, following her husband, Lou – he died in 1992 – who had come five years prior. "When we were engaged, I told him I would only marry him if he took me to Canada.

"A rich man in town also wanted to marry me, so to get away from him, [Lou and I] took a horse and buggy and drove to Opatow to get married. The money wasn't important to me."

An uncle in New York sent her money for a ticket to Canada, she said, and she brought along her three-year-old cousin Dorothy, now in her 80s, who was among the 60 people who attended Lederman's 100th birthday celebration. Also at the party were her two children, Elly Sherman and Lawrence Lederman, as well as her four grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

Lederman said that her mother died when she was a young girl, and her father and three brothers died in the war. "My husband had 16 children in the family, and some of them also died in the war.

"We didn't have much family here, but we had very good friends in the Ivansker Mutual Benefit Society. It was our life for many years."

She worked side by side with her husband until they retired in the 1970s, she said. "First we worked together at a dress factory where I was a sewer and he was a cutter."

In the mid-1940s, they opened Eleanor's Ladies Wear on Mt. Pleasant Avenue, and went on to own other womenswear stores.

Sherman said the family attributes their mother's longevity to her hard work and her love of keeping fit.

"It was important to her to keep healthy, so she exercised, and watched what she ate. She only stopped doing yoga five years ago."

Looking at the card Lederman received from Queen Elizabeth, Lederman said, "sure it's nice, but doesn't everyone [who turns 100] get one?"

She stressed that she doesn't like to be with "old ladies. I don't want to hear people complain. Age is not how old you are, it's how you act."

Going strong at 101

Sara Langer, who turned 101 in April, still remembers arriving in Toronto from Poland with her mother and sister on a winter day in 1924.

"My uncle met us, because my father didn't drive. It was a cold, cold day, but there was no snow."

Langer, who was born in Ostrowiec in 1909, said that the day she arrived in Canada "was the happiest day of my life.

"Even if I wasn't happy, though, I wouldn't complain. You take whatever life gives you, and every day you do what you have to. You just keep going."

Sara Langer

Her father, Mendel – Langer was the fifth child of Toba and Mendel Weinrib – immigrated to Canada when Langer was a young girl, and she remembers when he returned to Poland to visit. "He did not like the candles and oil lamps, so he brought electricity into our home. I remember a beautiful, fancy light fixture."

Six months after Toba arrived in Canada with her two daughters, she left her family and went back to Poland to live with her son and daughter-in-law – her four sons eventually all left Poland on their own – because she was told everything in Canada was treif. She didn't like it in Poland, though, so her husband sent her a ticket and she came back.

Two of Langer's brothers moved to Detroit, and before Langer married, she lived there for four years, working in their grocery store.

She met her husband Hyman – he died at age 59 – when he rented a room across from the Weinrib family home.

They had a son, Sy, now 65, and two grandchildren, ages 19 and 22. She was active in the sisterhood of a small, local synagogue and was a member of the ladies auxiliary of the Ostrovtzer Society.

"Everything works out evenly," Sy Langer said. "My father died so young, but my mother is living to a beautiful age."

Langer remarried in 1981 to Harry Strauss, who died in 1998 at age 92.

Sy said, that genetics plays part in his mother's longevity, because her own mother lived until age 98. "My mother lived on her own until she was 94, and she always made sure to eat well."

Asked how it feels to be 101, Langer, who now lives at Baycrest's Apotex Centre, said that she has no idea any more how old she is. "Age is in your mind. If you feel young, you're young." — C.B.

Obituary

U of T professors killed in avalanche

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Avner Magen and Andrew Herzenberg had many things in common.

They were both academics, they were both athletic, they were both loving fathers and they will both be missed.

The two University of Toronto professors were killed by an avalanche on May 29 while climbing the Rouge Gorge glacier at Denali National Park in Alaska.

The good friends, who arrived at the park on May 24 and were flown out to the gorge, were descending a steep snow and ice gully when the avalanche hit.

The pair was spotted covered in snow, ice and rocks in full gear by another group of climbers, who called the U.S. National Park Service. Rangers flew in by helicopter and pronounced the two men dead.

Maureen McLaughlin, spokesperson for Denali National Park and Preserve, said avalanches are common during the spring.

"The snow packed from the winter and the spring that's sitting up higher in these peaks gets very heavy this time of year," she said, adding that rain and warmer weather caused the avalanche.

She said most avalanche warnings are spread by word of mouth, and the area Magen and Herzenberg were scaling, which can only be reached by plane, is typically populated by experienced climbers.

"There's miles of peaks and rocks, it's maybe a good 10-to-12-mile stretch," she said. "We don't prohibit people from going into the park, but we make people aware of what the conditions are like."

Herzenberg, 39, taught and specialized in renal pathology research at the University Health Network.

Born in South Africa, he grew up in Windsor, Ont., and studied at U of T's medical school, as well as at the University of British Columbia, where he focused on pathology. He joined UHN in 2003 as an assistant professor.

While Herzenberg was known for his research both nationally and internationally, Cathy Indig, director of early childhood education at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre's nursery, will remember him as a family man.

"He would do anything for his children," said Indig, who taught one of Herzenberg's two daughters.

"He just was always there for his children… he just loved people, he loved life, he loved adventure and exercise. He was always smiling, always hugging."

Magen, 42, did his undergraduate and graduate studies at Hebrew University and received his PhD in computer science in 2002. After holding a postdoctoral fellowship at NEC Research in Princeton, N.J., he joined U of T in 2002, first as a postdoctoral fellow, and then as an assistant professor in 2004. He was promoted to associate professor last year.

"Avner was a wonderful colleague with a terrific sense of humour and great energy," U of T's department of computer science said in an online tribute. "He was a dedicated research supervisor and a superb teacher whose mentorship inspired his students and all those around him.

"The loss of such mathematical brilliance will have a profound impact on his colleagues, collaborators and the entire research community".

Magen, who was an experienced mountaineer, also sent a child to the JCC's nursery.

Indig remembers him as being devoted to his three children.

"For each child, he had something special. He used to drive his son to school in the winter. In the summer [he'd ride] on his bike, singing to him the whole way to school. You could just see the love this man had for his child."

Itay Heled, a friend of Magen's, met him in 2002 through their children's daycare, where their daughters became friends.

On Campus

Students of today, voices of tomorrow

By KORTNEY L. SHAPIRO

Throughout my time at McGill University in Montreal, I've become aware of the strong Jewish presence on campus in the city I have called home for the last three years.

Although the common refrains of "There is so much anti-Semitism and hatred toward Israel on college campuses today" and "It's best that you not go to those rallies – they're dangerous for students" can be heard periodically, there has continued to be an unwavering number of students who support Israel, which was highlighted this year at McGill.

Kortney Shapiro

Recently in Toronto, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu noted the importance of students on college campuses who seek the truth on Israel and who are active in doing so. It's this responsibility to seek the truth that students should adhere to.

Regardless of coalitions and student groups that oppose Israel, it has been my involvement with Hillel McGill as programming and PR student representative that has allowed me to work closely with my peers to foster a positive arena for pro-Israel voices.

I have worked on a variety of campaigns and programs geared to both Jewish and non-Jewish students alike, whether it be a social networking event, a city-wide student Shabbat dinner or Holocaust Education Week. It all boils down to helping my generation find its own voice within the community.

Although there's a growing number of students who are indeed interested in providing their peers with pro-Israel programs and guidance, such enthusiasm can vary from campus to campus, as some students may not know how to get involved to begin with.

When asked how to keep students aware of the issues in the Middle East, Dan Hadad, a representative of the pro-Israel student campaign Size Doesn't Matter, stated, "The more engagement opportunities we can provide, the better we will be at attracting new advocates."

Guest Voice

In the current political climate in the Middle East and around the world, students on their university and college campuses should be active and conscious of what is going on while standing up for a country that, without our proactive voices, cannot stand on her own.

This past March, our Hillel McGill programming team was able to bring I-Fest, a celebration of Israeli ingenuity, culture and entrepreneurial success, to the forefront of students' social calendars. The week included a cultural fair, information about getting involved on campus and on making aliyah to Israel, as well as representatives from Save a Child's Heart and both Tel Aviv and Hebrew universities.

The week came to a close with a fundraising party, with proceeds going to Save a Child's Heart, an organization in Israel that provides surgery for children with various heart problems.

The week was a success, and I look forward to I-Fest continuing to be a part of Hillel McGill's calendar of events.

While speaking in Toronto, Netanyahu thanked the crowd for their continued allegiance to Israel, stating that, "Year after year, you march for the truth, because one of the battles that we face is the battle for truth."

We will remain proactive on our college campuses and in our communities at large to combat the negative bias that Israel faces constantly.

As a student in today's world, I can say that I'm proud of my peers who have stood up to those who wish to annihilate Israel. I'm proud of my friends who tirelessly write opinion pieces and articles on issues that confront them in the news. I'm proud of those who make an active contribution in the community and on campus by encouraging and supporting pro-Israel advocacy.

Kortney Shapiro will be entering her fourth year at McGill University this fall.

Avalanche buries two friends

"He was very charming, he was a brilliant researcher and very, very unique in his way of thinking," he said.

Heled knew Magen as an adventurer, someone not afraid to take risks.

"Let's say he went to Turkey. Some people learn about… where they are going. He just learned how to speak Turkish [and left]," Heled said.

When thinking about his friend, Heled remembered one cold December day when they met up at a pub.

"It was a very cold day, everywhere is snow, people are afraid to get out of the car… He came on a bicycle, he had a T-shirt and very light coat. I was freezing when I came with the car, and his hands were totally warm. And he smiled," he said.

Heled compared his friend's personality to Ali G, the larger-than-life character created by comedian Sacha Baron Cohen.

"This is Avner, full of energy, full of surprises and lots of fun. That was meeting Avner… You always want more," he said.

Magen leaves his wife, Ayelet, and three children, Ofri, Noa and Roy.

Herzenberg leaves his wife, Leanne Shafir, and their daughters, Talia, 11 and Gabrielle, 8.

A fund has been created for Magen's wife and children. To donate, visit his tribute blog at www.avnermagenmemorial.com. A fund has also been created in Herzenberg's name to support renal pathology research at the UHN. To donate, call 416-340-4430.

Renewal aims to find kidney donors

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Ari was 17, he wanted to make aliyah to Israel. Then his kidneys started failing.

"The condition's called membranous nephropathy," said Ari, who didn't want his real name used.

Membranous nephropathy is a kidney disease that causes inflammation of the structures inside of the kidney that help filter waste and fluids.

For Ari, 24, this diagnosis changed more than his immigration plans.

"Everything was on hold in my life. Just how you feel, you feel horrible," he said. "While the kidneys are failing, you have a lot of side effects. One of them is water retention."

This meant that, while retaining water, his face looked like someone had punched him, Ari said.

"I couldn't even recognize myself a lot of days."

At 21, Ari was put on dialysis, a process of cleaning the blood in which a large machine filters waste and fluids from a person's body.

"Your blood gets taken out either through your arm or chest. It goes through the machine, filters the blood, takes out excess potassium… it regulates a lot of different things."

Ari is on dialysis eight hours a day, five days a week.

"Dialysis in itself, waking up in the morning, you feel out of it. You can't just get out of bed and then just go to work. It takes time to wake up from the machine. It's very hard on the body," he said. "What I'm doing in 40 hours a week, you're doing 24/7… It's hard on the body."

If left on dialysis for too long, his heart could become affected, he said.

"A lot of times you can't stay on dialysis indefinitely. What happens is, your heart could start getting worn out… you can experience heart failure," he said.

Shortly after being put on dialysis, Ari was placed on the kidney transplant list. It could take up to seven years before he gets a kidney.

Which is where John Anhang comes in.

Anhang is the founder of Toronto's chapter of Renewal, an organization started in New York that works within the Jewish community to find donors and co-ordinate kidney transplants.

"Dialysis is basically a long-term death sentence," Anhang said.

This realization, coupled by the fact that Renewal helped his friend in Jerusalem find a kidney donation, led Anhang to start a Renewal chapter in Toronto last November.

"[I thought] certainly there must be people in our community here who are in need of a kidney and there would be people that are generous and kind-hearted enough to consider donating," he said.

Renewal Toronto founder John Anhang speaks at an April 29 event, organized by the Chabad organizations in the GTA, that raised awareness of the need for kidney transplants.

Renewal Toronto, like New York's Renewal, helps find donors and co-ordinates all the details of the transplant, including any financial issues.

"There aren't any medical expenses, however, [donors] will incur some expenses," he said:

These expenses include any lost wages, since donors will be unable to work for two to three weeks, as well as any possible travel and child-care expenses.

"The important thing Renewal Toronto does, we reimburse for all out-of-pocket expenses and any lost wages. If someone is willing to do this wonderful act, we don't want their financial situation to stand in [their] way," he said, adding that this is made possible by local donations.

So far, Renewal Toronto is trying to find kidneys for seven people, including Ari.

After its latest event at the end of April, which was organized by the Chabad organizations of the Greater Toronto Area, Anhang has a total of about 30 potential donors, though this won't necessarily equal to 30 kidneys, he said.

Apart from cultivating donations and donors, Anhang is also trying to raise awareness about kidney disease and the transplant process in the Jewish community.

"Most people are unaware of this issue. Most people think [donating a kidney] is very dangerous," he said, adding that there are also Jewish misconceptions.

"Some people believe that when a person passes away, they have to be buried intact, they can't give away an organ."

According to Anhang, this is a false assumption.

"Kidney donations are fully encouraged in the Jewish tradition and Jewish law… leading rabbis in Toronto have approved of kidney donations," he said, adding that the only limitations kidney donors will live with is that they won't be able to play full-contact sports.

While Anhang is starting small, with seven people on his recipient list, he has big goals.

"I want to keep our objectives attainable. At this point, we're dealing with the Greater Toronto area. I'd like to expand to Ontario, and maybe Canada," he said. "Our mission, my dream, is that anyone who needs a kidney gets one within six months."

Clinic fundraiser a tribute to Barbra Schlifer

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Barbra Schlifer was sexually assaulted and murdered on April 11, 1970, hours after celebrating her call to the bar of Ontario.

After her death, Schlifer's friends – who were to be her law partners – Frances Rappaport and Patricia Ashby, decided to establish a clinic in her honour that would commemorate her life.

The four women who ultimately became instrumental in opening the doors of the Barbra Schlifer Commemorative Clinic on April 11, 1985, are Elizabeth Stewart, Jennifer Sunley, Helen La Fountaine and Mary Bruce Dauphinee.

The clinic, located at 188 Dupont St. in Toronto, provides free legal, counselling and cultural interpretation services for women survivors of violence. Since its inception, the clinic has served over 35,000 women, and now has a staff of more than 20 and a budget of about $2 million.

A fundraising event in honour of the 25th anniversary of the Barbra Schlifer Commemorative Clinic is being held June 15, 6:30 p.m., at the C Lounge, 456 Wellington St. W.

Amanda Dale, executive director of the clinic, said that Schlifer was a "young, visionary, idealistic lawyer and her friends set up the clinic with her vision in mind."

The clinic receives referrals from community-based agencies, as well as medical, legal and criminal justice professionals, religious organizations and individuals concerned about violence against women.

It delivers programs and services that are designed to promote women's autonomy and safety, increase women's access to justice and community services, and to ensure better co-ordinated and more effective service provision to women.

Dale said that the upcoming fundraiser is a tribute to Schlifer, as well as to the power of friendship.

"As we commemorate 25 years of serving women survivors of violence, we are grateful for all of the support from our partners, donors and volunteers. Barbra's legacy is one of hope and inspiration to so many in our community, and we look forward to raising funds to celebrate this milestone and promote freedom from violence for years to come."

The clinic's major fundraising event, since 1995, has been A Tribute to Friendship. Last year's tribute raised more than $100,000.

Dale said that clinic staff are particularly excited about this year's tribute because "we are marking a watershed in our growth. The clinic is entering its second 25 years."

Dale, who is pursuing a master's degree in international human rights law, and has a master's degree in social and political thought, said that much of the violence that women experience "does not start on our doorsteps. We serve a lot of new Canadians from a variety of backgrounds, and we provide counselling for all kinds of violence.

"The legal community sees us as a vital organization, because we perform a role that most law firms cannot provide."

For information and tickets to the tribute, call Meldina, 416-323-9149, ext. 237, or e-mail general@schliferclinic.com.

Young professionals raise money for hospital

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

Hundreds of people between the ages of 20 to 30 partied recently at the first annual young professionals' portion of the Mount Sinai Gala, which raised $1.6 million for women's health this year.

Dancing and singing along to the live music of legendary Grammy Award-winning artist Lionel Richie, the attendees of the May 25th Sinai Soirée, at the Sheraton Centre Hotel in Toronto, celebrated their efforts to donate to "a great cause and a world-renowned hospital," said Sarah Jacobs, event co-ordinator for the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary.

This year's 57th Mount Sinai Gala raised awareness about the hospital and helped generate funds for research, education and patient care in support of the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary's $4.5-million pledge for women's health.

The auxiliary is committed to supporting a comprehensive strategy to initiate transformative technological upgrades throughout the hospital. Information about prescriptions and administration of medications will be brought together in a single record for every in-patient, along with a collection of patient information that is easily retrievable and can be shared by the health-care team.

The funding ensures that state-of-the-art health care is provided to Mount Sinai Hospital's centres of excellence, including Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute and the Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health.

The pledge benefits the hospital's major pillars of patient care, research, technology and education by providing critical support to ensure Mount Sinai remains a world leader on the medical stage.

Jacobs said this year's gala included young professionals to introduce and engage a new generation into the Mount Sinai Hospital family. "These young professionals will be the future philanthropists of our community, and it is important to get them involved at a young age."

Lauren Winberg, who chaired the event, said she was "overwhelmed and elated at the success of the evening. This being the first year of the Sinai Soirée, we weren't sure what to expect, but the night spoke for itself. More than 400 young professionals under 30 years old were in attendance, and it was obvious that the energy in the room was positive and everyone was having a fantastic time. Richie was incredibly engaging and set the tone for everyone to party 'All Night Long.'"

Jacobs said a new young professionals division of the auxiliary will be started in the next few months "for people in their 20s and 30s to get involved in the community and start giving back."

Established in 1953, the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary has more than 1,300 members raising funds for patient care, teaching and research. Through special events and other programs, the auxiliary is one of the largest single donors to Mount Sinai Hospital.

Magic is not just kid stuff, says magician

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

After 15 years of performing magic shows, Ben Train says he rarely sees a trick that fools him. But when he does, he wants to keep it that way.

It's really special to see something you just don't understand, he says. That's why he loves performing his illusions for adults.

"Everybody thinks of magic as something for children, but I really think it's more intelligent and intellectual," he says. "It's certainly family friendly, but this isn't kids' magic."

The 25-year-old philosophy major first discovered a love of magic when he was eight years old, an interest that he says is not unusual for kids.

"I think all young boys have an interest in magic," he says. "The only difference with me is I didn't outgrow it."

When he was 16, he tutored a child at a house across the street from a magic store, he says. He purchased a trick deck and learned to perform it that night.

The next day, he went back to the store and watched someone demonstrate the same trick – but this time, it was with a normal deck, performed using sleight of hand.

From that moment, he was hooked.

Becoming a magician wasn't easy, he says. It involved fine-tuning his motor skills, learning to speak in front of a crowd and becoming comfortable chatting with a group of strangers.

His mother, Shayne Train, says his personality really contributes to his ability to put on a great performance.

"Part of being a magician is being able to distract people while you're doing the tricks," she says. "He could be a standup comedian as well."

Ben Train says, when he performs, he doesn't lie to his audience. He knows he doesn't have magical powers, and he doesn't let them think otherwise. Instead, he assures them he performs illusions.

He also accommodates his show to fit his audience, even going so far as to perform a magic show for blind people by using tactile tricks as opposed to visual ones.

For example, one trick involves having a blind audience member taste a sweet treat and a sour drink. Without going near the taster, he says he would reverse the tastes of the foods, transforming it into a sour treat and a sweet drink.

He says he loves the feeling of making people happy with his show, and loves performing for sick children.

"It's pretty special to be able to show it to someone who's unhappy or ill, and it brightens their day," he says.

He joined in on illusionist David Copperfield's Project Magic, which brings magicians into hospitals to teach physically challenged people how to perform sleight of hand.

He loves sharing his abilities, insisting that magic should be inclusive. He teaches a free monthly class at the Browser's Den, at Bathurst Street and Eglinton Avenue in Toronto.

One of the biggest challenges in learning to perform magic was finding people and resources to help him improve his skills, he says. Magicians tend to insist on secrecy, which makes it a exclusive community, and one that's very difficult to break into.

But Train says whether it's an art, craft or philosophy, experts should be willing to take new performers under their wing and teach them a foundation of skills.

"Everybody knows the first rule of being a magician is that you don't tell people how your tricks are done," he says. "But if you're really serious, I'd teach you anything you'd want to know."

His favourite magician is Dai Vernon, a Canadian magician who lived until he was 98. Train describes him as a pioneer of one-on-one magic, such as David Blaine's street magic.

As a young Jew, he sees similarities between the magic and Jewish communities. Both, he says, are very welcoming. No matter where he goes, he says there's always a family willing to share their home or a Shabbat dinner.

"With magic, it's the same thing," he explains. "When I go to a [foreign] city, I don't go to a hotel. There's always someone who will let me stay at their home."

He points out there are several magic stores in predominantly Jewish areas of Toronto, such as the Browser's Den.

Train will perform a show with Asi Wind, an accomplished Israeli magician, at a club in Toronto in mid-June.

The goal, Train says, is to bring more Israeli magicians to Canada. Many of them have moved to North America to chase greater success, so it isn't too expensive to bring them in, he says.

He says his favourite tricks are the ones involving gambling. For example, an audience member might shuffle a deck and, without looking, Train would pick out poker hands such as four-of-a-kind aces or a royal flush.

He learned many of his card tricks from The Expert at the Card Table, by S. W. Erdnase.

"It's a hard book to study, and it's a really important book," he says. "There are a lot of people who really like that book, but there are not a lot of people who can actually do the material."

The fact that he does understand the book has opened doors, he says, giving him the opportunity to meet many celebrities.

"There's a lot of people who have had an interest in magic," he says, citing examples such as comedian Colin Mochrie, members of punk rock band Billy Talent and television host Ben Mulroney.

He says the magic world is different from other forms of entertainment. Someone who's interested in movies can't just call up Steven Spielberg for advice. But in the magic community, once a magician knows the person is serious, he or she is usually happy to talk.

But the best thing about magic is it surprises people.

"[With technology,] we're never surprised anymore," he says, explaining that we can use search engines to know exactly what will happen in a movie before we see it. "We know everything that's happening in front of us."

But not with magic. That's what makes it so special, he says. "Magic sort of throws that for a loop."

Israel Navy stops terrorists from sailing from Gaza

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Israel Navy opened fire on an armed squad of five Palestinians wearing diving suits and apparently on their way to attack Israeli targets, the Israel Defence Forces said Monday morning.

An army source told Ha'aretz that at about 4:30 a.m., naval commandos identified and fired on a boat carrying five armed Palestinians heading north from waters off the Nuseirat refugee camp in the central Gaza Strip.

Gaza sources reported that four Palestinians were killed. Hamas later confirmed the deaths and said a fifth Palestinian was missing – although conflicting reports from Gaza claimed at least two of the five-member squad survived.

Four bodies were retrieved and taken to a hospital in central Gaza, said Moawiya Hassanain, a Palestinian health official. Two of the dead had suffered multiple gunshots to the head, Hassanain said.

Other Palestinian sources told Ha'aretz that the militants were members of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, an extremist offshoot of the Fatah faction led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

The militants were training for a rare attempt at a seaborne attack on Israel when they encountered Israeli forces, the sources said.

The IDF said there were no Israeli casualties.

An unnamed military official told Army Radio that the operation had been a boost for the navy's elite commando unit, Shayetet 13, which has come under international scrutiny since killing nine activists in a raid on a Gaza-bound aid flotilla a week ago.

"This will be a shot in the arm for the commandos after the hard week they have been through," the official said.

Two weeks ago, IDF troops near the Gaza border escaped unharmed after a bomb planted by Palestinian militants exploded close to the border fence.

That bombing came a day after two mortar shells fired by Palestinian militants in Gaza struck near the city of Ashkelon, without any casualties or damages reported.

SHIP ARRIVES

The Free Gaza Movement flotilla's ship, Rachel Corrie, approaches the port of Ashdod on June 5, accompanied by Israeli naval ships. Senior Israeli officials said the ship's passengers didn't show resistance and offered a ladder to soldiers boarding the vessel.

Photos of beaten soldiers released

Turkey's highest circulation newspaper Hurriyet on Sunday released photos of Israeli navy commandos who had been embroiled in the clash aboard the Gaza-bound Turkish aid ship Mavi Marmara last week.

The Israel Defence Forces released a video depicting the activists aboard the ship attacking the navy commandos. The activists said they'd been attacked first. Nine activists were killed in the melee, and dozens, including Israeli soldiers, were hurt.

The photos published by Hurriyet, under the headline "Tears of a commando," show Israeli soldiers, beaten and bleeding, being carried below deck by Turkish activists.

The accompanying article said the photos had been deleted by Israeli fighters to prevent embarrassment for Israel and the IDF, but the activists were able to restore them. The paper further reported that in some of the photos, activists belonging to the IHH are seen caring for the wounded soldiers.

IHH is the Islamist group that organized the flotilla that tried to carry aid to the blockaded Gaza Strip last week. The Mavi Marmara was one of eight ships taking part.

The IDF issued a response to the Turkish photos, saying that the "published pictures serve as clear and unequivocal proof of Israel's repeated arguments that aboard [the ship] were mercenaries who intended to kill Israeli soldiers."

Israel singled out, Iran ignored at nuclear conference

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada joined 180 other countries at a recent UN conference on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty by supporting a resolution that calls on Israel to join the pact and aims to convene a conference in 2012 to establish a nuclear-free Middle East.

Critics said the final document of the 2010 Review Conference of the Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (NPT) singled out Israel while ignoring Iran, an NPT signatory that they say is in violation of its commitment against developing nuclear weapons.

Appearing to take a step back from Canada's position in support of the 2012 conference, Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon later told reporters no such gathering should take place until Iran complies with its obligations under the NPT.

"The single greatest threat to global peace and security is Iran's regime, who have no interest in bringing peace to the Middle East. Indeed their belligerent and deceitful ways, particularly with their non-compliance with [International Atomic Energy Agency] obligations threaten the very existence of the Jewish state," Cannon told Canwest News Service.

Israel, meanwhile, rejected the resolution outright, calling it "deeply flawed and hypocritical" and saying it is not bound by it, since it has never signed the NPT.

"It ignores the realities of the Middle East and the real threats facing the region and the entire world. It singles out Israel, the Middle East's only true democracy and the only country threatened with annihilation. Yet the terrorist regime in Iran, which is racing to develop nuclear weapons and which openly threatens to wipe Israel off the map, is not even mentioned in the resolution," said a statement from the office of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The month-long conference ended with a final resolution that, in addition to proposing the 2012 meeting, also called on Israel to join the treaty and allow a United Nations nuclear watchdog group to inspect its facilities.

The United States, which agreed to co-sponsor the 2012 conference with Britain, Russia and the UN secretary general, backed the final resolution.

In Ottawa, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) applauded Cannon's statement. "It's Cannon's view that the international community's exclusive focus should be on NPT signatories that are proving a unique threat to regional stability," said CIC CEO Shimon Fogel.

"We appreciate that Canada is not being distracted from paying attention to Iran."

Turning to the American support for the resolution, Fogel said it is "certainly a departure from the position taken by successive American administrations over the years. We take the view that any singling out of Israel is inappropriate and unhelpful.

"It's a red herring to suggest Israel requires that kind of attention. Any kind of pressure on Israel to be a signatory to the treaty that doesn't even work – Iran, Syria, Iraq, North Korea were all flagrant violators of agreements to which they are signatories – is unhelpful," he said.

Gerald Steinberg, professor of political studies at Bar-Ilan University in Israel, said Canada and other western nations appear to have followed the American lead in supporting the final resolution.

"The United States was the main actor in the process," Steinberg said from Israel. The Obama administration has made nuclear disarmament one of its foreign policy goals and to achieve consensus on the final resolution, it appears to have acceded to a longstanding Egyptian demand to focus on the Israeli nuclear arsenal. As for the omission of Iran, "Egypt and the broader Arab and Islamic coalition refused to name Iran, and the United States capitulated," said Steinberg, who is also executive director of NGO Monitor.

Canada, Australia and other western governments went along with the United States, but afterward, U.S. and Canadian spokespeople, recognizing Israel would never agree to a review conference as envisioned, issued statements supporting Israel.

"As soon as they realized there would be a crisis out there [in 2012], they pulled themselves away from the text they just agreed to," he said.

Lawrence Cannon

Cannon's statement fits into that analysis, Steinberg suggested, while in the United States, similar positioning was taking place.

JTA reported that U.S. national security adviser Gen. James Jones said after adoption of the resolution, "The United States will not permit a conference or actions that could jeopardize Israel's national security. We will not accept any approach that singles out Israel or sets unrealistic expectations. The United States' longstanding position on Middle East peace and security remains unchanged, including its unshakable commitment to Israel's security."

Jones said the United States "deplores the decision to single out Israel in the Middle East section" of the document, and also deplores "the failure of the resolution to mention Iran, a nation in longstanding violation of the NPT and UN Security Council resolutions, which poses the greatest threat of nuclear proliferation in the region."

In Ottawa, Cannon's office released a statement elaborating on his earlier comment, saying "Canada continues to believe that the gravest threat comes from states such as Iran that wish to gain nuclear status and North Korea's regime. A nuclear Iran would have hugely destabilizing effects for both regional and global stability."

"Canada continues to hope for a day where the NPT is universally adopted," the statement added.

Steinberg said the U.S. support for the resolution reverses a 15-year promise by previous administrations to refuse to support documents specifically naming Israel. "This therefore represents a major change against Israel's interests by the United States," he said.

KLEZMER-INSPIRED, ACCORDION PLAYING, FUNK-WORSHIPPING... ARTISTICALLY FEARLESS

Israel may set up internal investigation

"I told [Ban] that the investigation of the facts must be carried out responsibly and objectively," Netanyahu told the ministers. "We need to consider the issue carefully and level-headedly, while maintaining Israel's national interests as well as those of the Israel Defence Forces."

The prime minister said he told Ban that some of the passengers aboard the stormed Mavi Marmara were members of an extremist terror-backing Turkish organization. He stressed that any investigation into the event should determine who organized these extremists, who funded them and supplied them with equipment, and how they ended up on the ship.

Netanyahu also discussed Israel's blockade on Gaza, saying that talks on easing the blockade had begun before the flotilla ever set sail.

"Our desire is to facilitate the transfer of civilian and humanitarian goods to the civilian population while preventing the transfer of weapons and warfare materials." He added that the "provocative flotilla will not stop us from discussing this, and we are considering proposals on the topic made by friendly nations."

The prime minister also told cabinet that he spoke with Biden over the weekend, as well as the prime ministers of Greece and Bulgaria.

Nine Turks were killed on May 31 in the Israeli commando raid on the Mavi Marmara, part of a six-vessel convoy that set out to challenge an Israeli-led blockade. Israel said its troops used lethal force in self-defence after they were set upon by pro-Palestinian activists wielding clubs and knives.

Israeli leaders have spoken publicly about setting up an internal investigation with foreign observers into the interception of the Turkish-flagged ship off the coast of Gaza, an enclave run by Hamas Islamists who oppose western-backed Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' peace efforts with Israel.

"Israel is a democratic nation. Israel has the ability and the right to investigate itself, not to be investigated by any international board," Oren said.

Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu, speaking on CNN, said Ankara would insist on an independent commission and suggested that Israel's rejection of an international inquiry showed it wanted to cover up the facts of the raid.

"We want to know the facts. If Israel rejects this, it means it is also another proof of their guilt. They are not self-confident to face the facts," he said.

Turkey's relations with Israel, once a close ally, have soured badly since the deadly raid.

Meanwhile, senior officials in the Israeli Foreign Ministry said Saturday that Israel won't apologize for the raid. The remarks came after Turkish threats to sever diplomatic ties with Israel if the latter failed to apologize for harm caused to Turkish citizens.

Israel's navy boarded another ship carrying aid and pro-Palestinian activists to Gaza on Saturday. Its interception of the Irish-owned Rachel Corrie ended without violence, after diplomatic efforts to avoid bloodshed.

"I want to pay tribute to the crew of the Rachel Corrie for demonstrating in no uncertain terms their peaceful intentions," Irish Foreign Minister Micheál Martin told Irish public radio RTE. "We, of course, communicated that relentlessly to the Israeli authorities."

An Israeli official said Israel wanted to establish whether the Turkish government had sponsored the Mavi Marmara, where the strength of the resistance to the boarding party appeared to have caught the Israeli military off guard. Israel has said seven of its troops were wounded.

Correspondent sorry for anti-Israel remarks

JTA

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Veteran White House correspondent Helen Thomas has apologized for saying that Jews should "get the hell out of Palestine."

Thomas said Jews living in Israel should "go back home to Poland, Germany, America and everywhere else," during remarks made on video to Rabbi David Nesenoff of RabbiLive.com on the sidelines of the White House Jewish Heritage Day event on May 27.

The video of Thomas' remarks had more than 900,000 views as of Sunday morning.

Thomas, 89, who works for Hearst Newspapers, issued an apology last Friday.

"I deeply regret my comments I made last week regarding the Israelis and the Palestinians," she said in a written statement.

Video spoof a real hit

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

An Israeli-produced parody taking on the world's criticism of Israel following the Gaza flotilla clashes has garnered nearly one million views on YouTube.

Sung to the tune of We Are The World, originally recorded to raise funds for Africa in the 1980s, the re-written song attacks what it calls the one-sided portrayal of events that has been broadcast across the world with their version called We'll Con the World. The clip was created by a Hebrew-language media satire site called Latma. The video is interspersed with clips from the recent Israeli raid on the Gaza-bound aid ship.

Recession fuels Russian aliyah

Aliyah from the former Soviet Union grew last year by 21 per cent over 2008, with 6,818 Russian-speaking immigrants moving to Israel in 2009. In the first four months of 2010, aliyah is up a further 22 per cent compared with the same period last year, according to the Jewish Agency for Israel. From Russia alone, the rise has been slightly greater. Last year, 3,150 Russians moved to Israel compared with 2,605 in 2008, and this year's increase so far shows an even greater uptick: 905 in the first four months of 2010, an increase of about 25 per cent over 2009. Observers attribute the rise to the global recession, which has prompted some Jews to reconsider their future in Russia. The recession has hit Russia harder than it has hit Israel.

South Africa recalls ambassador

South Africa recalled its ambassador to Israel but doesn't plan to cut diplomatic ties, a government official said. The decision followed Israel's deadly interception of a Gaza-bound flotilla, in which nine people were killed during a confrontation with Israeli troops. "The recall of Ambassador Ishmael Coovadia is to show our strongest condemnation of the attack. This recent Israel aggression of attacking the aid flotilla severely impacts on finding a lasting solution to the problems of the region," Deputy International Relations Minister Ebrahim Ebrahim told journalists in Pretoria. South Africa has no intention of expelling the Israeli ambassador to the country, Ebrahim said. Avrom Krengel, chairman of the South African Zionist Federation, told the Mail & Guardian that the incident was "unfortunate and entirely regrettable." He criticized the South African government for acting "in a biased manner" in condemning the attack.

Soldier's kidnapping planned

A senior Israeli official claimed that activists aboard the Gaza-bound aid ship boarded by Israeli commandos had plans to kidnap an Israeli soldier. Daniel Ayalon, Israel's deputy foreign minister, made the claim in a conference call with 3,000 supporters of Christians United for Israel. He said that the activists were equipped with weapons and gas masks and had segregated the more peaceful activists below deck. Ayalon didn't cite evidence for his claims. Nine activists were killed in the raid. Seven Israeli soldiers were wounded.

Obama extends embassy move waiver

U.S. President Barack Obama has extended a waiver for an additional six months delaying moving the U.S. Embassy to Jerusalem. Obama's waiver, issued June 2, follows in the footsteps of predecessors Bill Clinton and George W. Bush, who also extended the waiver every six months since the law was adopted in 1995 calling for the move of the embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. Presidents can delay the move on national security grounds. Some Jewish groups have pushed for the United States to move the embassy as a way to bolster Israeli claims to the city. Those favouring the waiver say such a step would anger the Arab world and put the United States in the position of taking sides on an issue that should be settled in peace talks. – files from JTA

Israeli singer celebrates Jewish composers

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

To Gitit Shoval, music is a virus.

"A good virus. You can't get rid of it," she said.

Shoval first started singing in Israel when she was 13 in 1978. Since then, she has recorded several albums, played countless shows and, seven years ago, moved to Toronto.

"We have four kids," she said of herself and her husband, music producer Ron Druyan. While performing in Israel, Shoval had little time to spend with her children, who are now 24, 19, 14 and 11.

> 'I just fell in love with this material'

"I was working really hard in Israel, I was out of the house, I had [musical] groups I conducted… [In Canada] I decided to concentrate on [my kids]… to be a stay-at-home mom was an outstanding experience," she said.

While adapting to her new role, Shoval also helped her husband with their company, GRD International in Canada, which dubs cartoons worldwide in such languages as Russian, Hebrew and Mandarin.

"I'm the [voice of] Israeli Barbie and the Israeli Smurfette," Shoval said.

But after a few years, the singer began to miss her microphone.

"After three or four years, I decided to start singing again."

At first she started small, like singing the national anthem at a Blue Jays game. But it wasn't enough.

"Around two years ago, it started to tickle me. I wanted to start [performing] again."

Gitit Shoval

For Shoval, the challenge was finding a style and language that she connected with. She didn't want to limit herself to Hebrew songs, but didn't quite feel right singing only in English.

"I started to listen to songs. There was a nice number of songs I really liked. I was surprised to find out that most of the writers are Jewish and I thought… 'I can connect through this,'" she said.

These songs, which included Somewhere Over the Rainbow, Hallelujah and You've Got a Friend, aren't necessarily Jewish, but they represented an important contribution to the musical community. "We started to rehearse [these songs], Ron and I, and I just fell in love with this material. It came to a point where we wanted to create a show," she said.

And they did.

Shoval, with the help of her husband, who also plays piano, and her two children, Tutti, 19, a singer, and Shaqed, 14, who plays percussion, will be performing this month at York University's Tribute Hall before launching an American tour.

The show, called From Gershwin to Dylan: The Genius of Jewish Song Writers, is Shoval's first major concert since Shoval immigrated to Canada. Except that now, her whole family is involved.

"This is my dream. It's actually a family business," she said, adding that her oldest daughter, Tomi, and her youngest daughter, Emily, are helping to produce the show.

The concert itself is a tribute to Jewish composers and will also include stories about musicians, including Carole King and George Gershwin.

"There's a difference between Jewish music and Jewish writers," Shoval said. "We're such a small nation. The influence of the Jewish people on global music is unbelievable. There's so many hits."

Shoval decided which songs to include in the concert based on her own taste and the connection she felt to the melody.

"It was a matter of… what I liked, what I thought would suit my voice," she said.

"It's like, how do you know when you fall in love? You just know it. I sing it… and it's there."

While organizing the concert, the singer decided to donate all profits, after expenses, to charity, something that she plans to do for all her performances from now on.

"I decided every note I'm going to sing, at least part of it, will be for a good cause," she said, adding that the money from this concert will go to the Barzilai Medical Center in Ashkelon, Israel.

Along with professional musicians, the show also includes performances from students at the Berklee College of Music in Boston, where Tutti participated in a five-week program.

"When I heard [the students play], I just fell off my chair. To be able to work with such young people, it gives such freshness to your music," Shoval said.

Tickets for the concert, which starts at 8 p.m. on June 16 at York University's Tribute Community Recital Hall, range from $18 to $72. For more information or to buy tickets, visit yorku.ca/perform or call 416-736-5888.

Howard Engel honoured at Jewish Book Awards

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

A well-rounded octet of books garnered honours and prizes for their authors – and detective novelist Howard Engel won a special achievement award – last Thursday evening at the 22nd annual Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards before a near-capacity crowd in the Al Green Theatre of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

The prestigious fiction prize went to Newfoundland writer Robin McGrath for her novel The Winterhouse, set in a rugged Newfoundland outpost of the 1820s. The story focuses on the subtle budding romance between a young Jewish trader, Jacob Harris, and Rosehannah Quint, the teenage woman who helps him survive the winter.

Although the fictional Harris doesn't seem to care much for his Jewish heritage, that's clearly not the case with McGrath, who converted to Judaism when she was 17 – more than four decades ago.

The recipient of an earlier Jewish Book Award for a volume of poetry about five years ago, the Goose Bay resident has written about a dozen books, including a folk history of Newfoundland's Jewish community. Much lore from that book evidently made its way into her novel. "The material in The Winterhouse is fiction, but it's all rooted in real people and real stories that I heard," she told The CJN.

McGrath is probably the first writer honoured by the Jewish Book Awards who is an expert on the Inuit and who travels into the bush with them. Because The Winterhouse is so deeply rooted in its rugged natural settings of woods, shoreline and sea, it may be considered an old-fashioned Canadian novel whose theme has more to do with survival than anything else. But it's also a lovely romance.

Another Canadian region – the Prairies – was also spotlighted at the awards ceremony as Winnipeg author Allan Levine won the history prize for Coming of Age: A History of the Jewish People of Manitoba.

"People forget that the Winnipeg Jewish community is probably one of the greatest Jewish success stories in Canadian Jewish history," Levine said in accepting the award. "The narrative that the book chronicles is really the history of a determined group of Jewish immigrants and their descendants… to establish in Winnipeg one of the most vibrant and culturally rich Jewish communities in North America."

Montreal author Goldie Sigal won the prize for Yiddish literature for Stingy Buzi and King Solomon, an illustrated book for children with dialogue balloons in Yiddish, English and transliterated Yiddish. Also for young people, Puppet, the novel by Eva Wiseman, captured the youth literature prize for its historically accurate account of a Hungarian blood libel case of the late 1800s.

Jewish academics were well represented at this year's awards. Prof. Michael Marrus claimed the prize in Holocaust literature for Some Measure of Justice, his exploration of the most recent wave of justice-seeking reparation cases over the Holocaust.

Indiana-based Prof. Jeffrey Veidlinger won the prize for scholarship on a Jewish subject for Jewish Public Culture in the Late Russian Empire. The awards jury called it an "impeccably researched book on Jewish cultural and intellectual history [that] explores the grassroots movement by which Russian and Polish Jews engaged with culture in a public way in the early 20th century."

Toronto poet-essayist Ken Sherman took the prize in Jewish thought and culture for What the Furies Bring, his "lucid and lyrical collection" of essays that was inspired by the terror and tragedy of Sept. 11.

The awarding of the biography and memoir prize added immense spice to the evening. The prize went to David Sax for Save the Deli, a memoir in which he records his odyssey visiting the planet's most holy shrines related to the vanishing delicatessen. Sax, however, was on his honeymoon and could not attend the ceremony in person. Accepting the award on his behalf was publisher Doug Pepper of McClelland and Stewart, who speculated that deli was the reason so many gastro-enterologists are Jewish.

Engel, author of a series of crime novels featuring the celebrated Jewish detective Benny Cooperman, was honoured with a special achievement award some 30 years after the first of the books, The Suicide Murders, appeared.

"No crime fiction novel had ever been set in Canada with a Canadian hero before Howard did it," said his former editor, Cynthia Good, formerly of Penguin Canada. "When Engel found an audience for his writing, the floodgates opened for Canadian crime fiction. Howard opened the door for probably 200 writers to come after him."

Sponsored by the Koffler Centre of the Arts, the awards seem more of a city-wide event now that they are hosted in a downtown venue (Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue) as opposed to suburban North York (Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue). Those who gathered for the occasion seemed in possession of a remarkable zeitfleisch over the nearly two-hour ceremony. Not even the cramped lobby, which was clearly insufficient for all the mingling and bookselling that needed to be done, could dampen the enthusiasm of the crowd.

Renaissance man marks disc's 10th anniversary

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

June is busting out all over, especially for musical Renaissance man Mark Weinstock, who celebrates two milestones this month.

Weinstock's career has been built on evocative music and heartfelt lyrics, reflecting a folksy genre. He's marking the 10th anniversary of his first CD, Mark's Patchwork, with a concert at a Toronto club this month.

Also this month, Weinstock and his wife, Donna, will be celebrating their second anniversary. "We went overseas for a six-month extended honeymoon to India and Southeast Asia. I hadn't planned to, but I ended up singing and playing guitar in over 30 concerts there," he says, "Many of the love songs I've written were inspired by my wife."

Weinstock currently works with David Alter, exploring music's therapeutic role in medicine.

Weinstock has visited clinics and orphanages in India and Cambodia, where he introduced interactive music programs to the children. "We met some really special children along the way," he says.

Weinstock's music has inevitably evolved over the years. Ten years ago, at the age of 24, he wanted to make a name for himself, touring the world to become the new voice of a generation, an influential singer such as Leonard Cohen or Bob Dylan.

"Things have changed," he says. "I'm more comfortable writing music in many different styles now. I'm working on an updated Mark's Patchwork-style album.

"I'm also working with some fantastic musicians on a Jewish album, with Hebrew and English songs, taking Jewish concepts, from folklore, or the holy text, with musical styles across the board, from folk rock to African choral music."

Little Superstars is Weinstock's musical program for babies and toddlers. He teaches classes in a variety of settings, including schools, libraries and synagogues such as Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

"It's interactive with the caregivers, not only to have fun, but to promote language and motor development," he says. "Currently, I'm working on a children's album called Songs for Dreamers, which will take them through the day, with gentle wake-up songs, to dance songs, to lullabies."

A lifelong student of indigenous instruments, Weinstock learned to play the Indian bansuri flute during his honeymoon overseas.

"In India, we went to Oneg Shabbats in one of the old synagogues. We've also done Oneg Shabbats in the jungle," he says.

Weinstock and his wife spent Passover in Israel this year. While there, he performed in Tel Aviv. "It was a very special night," he says. "But my travelling has tapered off a bit, because great things are happening for me in Toronto."

A film producer who came to one of his concerts asked Weinstock to write songs for the 2004 movie Siblings, with Sarah Polley. He has also composed music for other films.

"It's great to be sitting in a movie theatre, watching a movie, and then all of a sudden a song comes on, and it's my song being played in this film," he says.

Mark's Patchwork: 10-Year Anniversary Show, at Trane Studio, 964 Bathurst St., on June 17 at 8 p.m., features musical guests Josh Engel, Elisheva Avishai, Ronen Segall, Daniel Shlagbaum, Steve Perzow and Nikhil Pai and others. For more information, call 416-913-8197 or visit www.markweinstock.com.

Jazz Festival has something for everyone, new director says

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

For Josh Grossman, becoming the artistic director for the TD Toronto Jazz Festival is a culmination of everything he has been doing for the past 10 years.

That includes working as the artistic director of the Markham Jazz Festival, the manager of High Park Choirs of Toronto and the production manager of the Royal Conservatory of Music. He's also the founder of the Toronto Jazz Orchestra.

Grossman, 33, has been a fixture on the local jazz scene. "Since getting out of school, I have pursued a variety of arts administrative stuff, performance, presenting and producing opportunities," he says. "So, this is a nice way to combine everything together."

As the artistic director of the festival, he replaces Jim Galloway, who retired last fall. The festival is now in its 24th season.

"When I heard that Jim Galloway had stepped down, I hadn't thought to apply," Grossman says. "I figured they already had hired someone, and then I had conversations with some people who encouraged me to apply. I took that as a sign and applied in mid-November, and by mid-December everything was all wrapped up."

For his first season this summer, Grossman says he's built on what was done in the past and made sure that a really good variety of music is presented. At the same time, he's put his stamp on this year's festival by programming music that he thinks is important to the contemporary jazz scene.

Grossman has talked with members of the local jazz community about their concerns and listened to their suggestions about the festival. Coming out of that is the reintroduction, after 10 years, of the Wave Series, which focuses on the contemporary, avant-garde side of jazz. The series, which will be held at the Music Gallery, advances jazz into the next generation, Grossman says.

But Grossman created a balance in his programming, making sure there is something for everybody. He says it is as important to pay attention and to honour where jazz has come from, as it is to look at where jazz is going.

This year's veteran lineup includes Herbie Hancock, Dave Brubeck, Maceo Parker and blues legend Taj Mahal.

Josh Grossman

"I want people coming away from the festival with an emotional response having been moved in some way by the music, and that people will take a bit of a risk, learn something new about the music and what jazz can mean," he says.

Grossman's duties as artistic director also include the off-season development of educational programs with the festival's community partner, Regent Park School of Music.

"This is vital as well," he says. "We have heard so much about the 'state of jazz' in philosophical terms, so it is really important that we continue to reach out to not only the next generation of jazz fans, but the next generation of jazz musicians and foster and encourage that talent.

"It is not an easy career choice to be a jazz musician, so we want to provide mentorship and encourage the development of new music and interesting jazz."

Grossman grew up with music and sang in the Beth Habonim Youth Choir. He said the choir was a musical, social, religious and cultural experience for him. It introduced him to a new group of people and inspired him, and provided experiences for him that he wouldn't have had in other places, including recording.

"Culturally, Judaism has a lot to contribute to music in general, and obviously a lot of the major performers, producers, record producers, and composers are Jewish," Grossman says.

The Toronto Jazz Festival runs from June 25 to July 4. Free daily noon and 5 p.m. performances by various artists, including Jaffa Road, take place at Nathan Phillips Square, in addition to ticketed events. For detailed listings, visit www.torontojazz.com.

Names in the News: David Harduf, the Toronto Hebrew teacher and scholar who died last February leaving his magnum opus unfinished, was clearly a man whose scholarly ambitions were nearly as immense as his vast Jewish knowledge.

The Polish-born rabbinically trained author toiled tirelessly over the last half-century to produce a series of important scholarly books and lexicographic works. They included Otzar Hashemot, a "treasury of names" of persons, places and even animals mentioned in the Torah, Mishnah and Talmud; a Yiddish-English English-Yiddish dictionary; a Shai Agnon Lexicon of persons and places in the works of the great Israeli writer, and various other publications.

Over the last two decades Harduf was engaged primarily in producing the first 19 volumes of his most ambitious project, titled Harduf's Transliterated English-Hebrew Dictionary. When he died the volume for the letter "S" was at the printer and the rest of the work – T to Z – was left unfinished.

According to friends, Harduf's widow, Eleanor, is hoping to locate someone capable of completing the remaining volumes. "She is looking for someone, but it's not so easy to find a scholar to finish the work," said Simcha Simchowitch, who recalled that his late friend "embodied the best of a traditional scholar (talmud chochem) of bygone days."

• • •

Names in the News II: Toronto-based author Howard Shrier's second novel, High Chicago, was named best crime novel of the year at the 2010 Arthur Ellis Awards last week in this city. Remarkably, Shrier's first novel Buffalo Jump took the prize last year for best first novel. Shrier is the first author in the 27-year history of the awards to win these two honours in consecutive years. "To say I am thrilled is an understatement," he said.

History of Nazi ghettos contained in two volumes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Nazi Germany forced Jews in Poland, the former Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia, Romania, Greece and Hungary into more than 1,100 ghettos during the course of World War II.

They are the subject of The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos During the Holocaust, a comprehensive two-volume account published last month by The Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority in Jerusalem and edited by Guy Miron and Sholomit Shulhani.

Since the ghettos were so central an element in the Nazi plan to exterminate Jews in Europe, this is a most valuable addition to the historiography of the Holocaust.

Consisting of essays written by specialists, this book is buttressed by 250 photographs, 62 maps and a DVD of wartime footage of ghettos.

Two Israeli experts, Yehuda Bauer and Israel Gutman, contribute a foreward placing the topic in perspective.

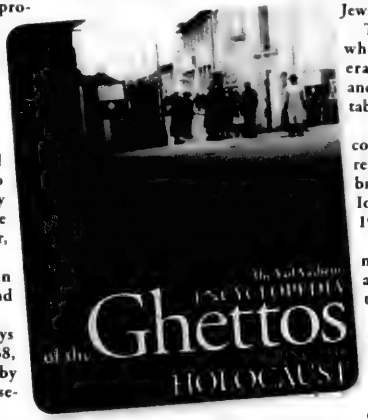
As they point out, the first ghettos were established by the Germans in Poland shortly after its conquest in 1939.

Up to Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union, the ghettos were regarded as temporary way stations until their inmates could be permanently resettled.

But after June 1941, their purpose changed, becoming holding pens for slave labour and annihilation.

Strangely enough, as contributor Dan Michman observes in the opening essay, the Nazi leadership in Germany never articulated a precise definition of the term ghetto.

"We have no single seminal document that expounds the roots of the concept, its nature, nor the methods and mechanisms for setting up and running a ghetto," he writes. "Quite the contrary. What we have is a welter of explanations and interpretations produced by Nazi bureaucrats while the Holocaust was raging – suggesting that the Germans themselves were certain neither about the ghetto's origins nor its rationale."



In fact, the classical ghetto was a 16th-century Italian creation, devised by Pope Paul IV in a papal bull in 1555 as an instrument to contain the Jews of Rome until they accepted baptism to Christianity. The first walled and gated ghetto, however, appeared in Venice.

The Rome ghetto, the last one in Italy, survived de jure until 1848 and de facto until 1870.

Sixty-eight years later, several days after Kristallnacht in November 1938, the notion of a ghetto was raised by Hermann Goering, Adolf Hitler's second-in-command.

The head of the security police, Reinhard Heydrich, was skeptical, saying that ghettos were impracticable from "a police perspective."

After Poland was conquered, Heydrich had a change of heart. He said, "The Jews in the cities should be contained in the ghetto, to permit better control and, subsequently, permit a better removal."

The Jews of western and central Poland were the first to be ghettoized. To the best of Michman's knowledge, the first ghetto in Poland was established in Piotrkow Trybunalski, in the province of Kielce.

Enforcement of the ghetto order was spotty, as many Poles continued to live and work in the ghetto until the spring of 1942.

The idea of a closed ghetto was initially tried in Lodz. Once it was up and running, it became a symbol and prototype of the Nazi ghetto in occupied Poland. As it happened, the Lodz ghetto was the last to be liquidated.

More than 70 ghettos were established in Belarus, with the ghetto in Minsk being the largest one.

Occupied Ukraine had more than 80 ghettos. In Russia, about half of the ghettos were located outside the boundaries of the Pale of Settlement, where most Jews lived during the Czarist era.

There is no explanation as to why pogroms and murder operations broke out in Ukraine and not in Belarus before the establishment of ghettos.

In Romania, the notion of concentrating Jews in a ghetto to resolve the "Jewish problem" was brought up by the head of state, Ion Antonescu, in the winter of 1941.

He wrote, "Were times normal... I would deport them all en masse... I cannot do that today."

Suggesting ghettoization for the Jewish inhabitants of Bucharest, the capital, Antonescu said that "the kikes could live among themselves, with their own commerce and own synagogues, until more settled times arrive and we can deport them beyond our borders, to territories to be defined for them."

With zeal, Antonescu also applied ghettoization to Transnistria, which fell under Romanian control in 1941.

In the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, in Czechoslovakia, the Nazis established the Theresienstadt ghetto and work camp.

Though it was a "ghetto for distinguished persons," to use misleading Nazi terminology, Theresienstadt was a transit camp as well, with many of its hapless inmates having been shipped to Auschwitz.

The ghetto system in neighbouring Hungary was prompted by Germany's invasion in 1944.

One hundred and eighty detention centres were opened, all of them intended to serve as collection camps for Jews scheduled to be transported to Auschwitz. In some Hungarian cities, Jews were allowed to live outside the confines of the ghetto.

When Miklos Horthy, the regent of Hungary, suspended the deportation of Jews in the summer of 1944, the last remaining ghetto in Hungary was in Budapest, the capital city.

Decentralized and housed in 2,100 buildings marked with a yellow star, the ghetto was scattered all over Budapest and lasted for only a few months. With its liberation by the Red Army, it was shut down.

Salonika was the only city in Greece on which the Nazis imposed a ghettoization policy. No explanation, unfortunately, is offered.

Nor is it explained why the Nazis did not fence in Amsterdam's Jewish quarter after signs were posted announcing it had become a ghetto.

Despite these gaps, The Yad Vashem Encyclopedia of the Ghettos During the Holocaust is quite an achievement in scholarship.

For the first time in any language, the history of Germany's ghetto policy can be found in two handy volumes.

Turn to page 76 and you will find an article on the ghetto in Brody. Go to page 227 and you can read about the ghetto in Grodzisk. Turn to page 665 and you can read about Rowne's ghetto. Flip to page 982 and you can immerse yourself in the details about the ghetto in Zhmerinka.

This most certainly is the definitive book on the Nazi ghetto system.

Toronto jazz musician records classic Polish song on new album

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Ron Davis never met his grandfather Joseph Ladowsky. He died before World War II. But Davis, a Toronto jazz pianist, is speaking to his grandfather through the spirit of a song about the Polish restaurateur on his new disc, My Mother's Father's Song.

Released recently, Davis' seventh jazz disc features the Polish song Bal u Grubego Joska (Party at Fat Joe's), a famous 1935 waltz describing Ladowsky's famous Warsaw restaurant. It's a party song, Davis says. After all, some of the lyrics read (translated to English): "At Fat Joe's at Gnojna Street, the old gang's elite has gathered/ Without food and without sleep, just to have something to drink."

Davis is overjoyed to include his interpretation of this classic Polish song on his new album. "This song represents a world now gone," he says. "It's an accessible song that connects you to a whole other dimension of Jewish history."

He says it has "that intangible quality of a great song. The composer really hit it out of the park. It's haunting and memorable and quite beautiful."

Finding the sheet music was pure luck.

Ron Davis

Finding the sheet music is a story of pure luck. Davis' mother visited the Polish pavilion at Toronto's Canadian National Exhibition several years ago and came across sheet music tucked away in a corner. She was amazed to find Bal u Grubego Joska, a song dedicated to her father's teashop, which was open from 2 a.m. Fat Joe's attracted porters and traders from nearby Zelazna Brama Square and Hale Mirowskie. Most notably, Davis found, Polish war hero Marshal Józef Pisudzki was a frequent guest at Fat Joe's.

"I haven't met a Polish person who doesn't know the song," Davis says. Every time he comes across someone who knows the waltz, Davis feels like he's learning more about his grandfather. A simple song inspires a genealogic quest.

The title song isn't the only unique aspect of Davis' new album. Davis tackled jazz standards, but not "run-of-the-mill standards," as he puts it. He brings some cool riffs to James Taylor's Don't Let Me Be Lonely Tonight and successfully tackles Stevie Wonder's For Once in My Life. His opening track should appeal to a younger demographic – Viva la Vida by rock band Coldplay.

With this album, Davis hopes listeners enjoy a mix of "entertainment, thoughtfulness and depth."

In addition to gigging and working on albums, Davis also runs business workshops, in which he blends jazz and workplace empowerment. He also dabbles in classical music. His project Symphronica fuses jazz piano and the symphony orchestra, and he's performed these compositions with the Windsor Symphony Orchestra and has been asked back in 2011.

Davis is active online, writing in his blog found at rondavismusic.com/blog. He writes about the life of a musician – the good and the ugly –and also chronicles his overseas tours, such as his recent adventure across Asia.

Israeli volleyball women within striking distance of Europe

By URI TALSHIR
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Just eight months ago, the Israel Volleyball Association put on hold an ambitious project to prepare the national women's team for the 2012 Olympic Games in London, England. Within a month, officials recognized their mistake, and the team returned to practice.

Israel's victory last week against Slovakia at the European Championship B pool qualifier in Sheffield, England, indicated the investment of nearly three years was well worthwhile.

"I don't think our achievements will change the opinion of those who stood in the corner and waited for the whole project to collapse," head coach Arie Selinger said after his team advanced to the third round of the championship. "There are some who don't want us to win, and I don't know why. Even if we win the championship I am not sure anything will change."

The road to the playoffs was long. Selinger is a volleyball legend who coached the U.S. men's team that took silver in the 1984 Olympics.

The project began almost three years ago, when Selinger was brought back to Israel to take over the women's national team and turn the players into a high-level squad.

The team went from practising two or three times a week to daily, and sometimes twice a day, and players received greater medical attention required for their more intense schedule. Officials who doubted the value of this investment tried to pull the plug in September, but later realized the extra time did make a difference.

After a frustrating loss to Ukraine, the squad had to beat Slovakia to finish second in its B pool and earn a home-and-away match against the second-place team from the A pool. Selinger says he knew it would be a tall order beating Slovakia, which had trounced Ukraine. "I arrived at the game with a heavy heart," he says. "I feared it would be too great an obstacle for us."

The players proved to their coach that all he had invested in them during the previous half year was not in vain. They rose to the occasion and defeated the Slovaks in three sets.

"Everything went like clockwork," says Selinger. "We surprised everyone – including ourselves. The ladies were mentally ready. They believed in themselves, and everyone was on the top of their game. It was probably our best game ever."

Selinger, 73, says the team is still not good enough to reach the top flight of international competition, but he hopes its success will change perceptions in Israeli sports.

"Focused projects on a daily basis with the proper financial support are the only way for us to achieve success," asserted the man who during his 40-year coaching career has won numerous awards, including a silver medal with the Netherlands at the 1992 Olympics.

"The problem in Israel is that we're not serious enough, we don't practise enough, our students are short, our patience is short, and so we never managed to get where we want to," Selinger said. "The youth are out there and we have the talent, but we have to work on the fundamentals."

Israel prepared for the current tournament by playing Belarus, winning three out of five matches. Ironically, Belarus is the team from the A pool that stands between Israel and its first appearance in the European finals since 1971.

"We know our rival, who knows us, too," Selinger said about the third round.

Peer can't keep pace with Serena Williams

By ELI SHVIDLER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — Hopes spurred by Shahar Peer's recent strong performances and a clay court, combined with a lingering injury nagging her opponent, crashed into reality as world No. 1 Serena Williams easily disposed of the Israeli 6-2, 6-2.

Williams used her power during the few moments she needed it to overwhelm the upstart Peer, ranked 18th, to advance to the quarter-finals at the French Open.

Williams is now undefeated in five matches with Peer. Last week's match took just 67 minutes. The American's complete dominance could be seen in her 75 per cent success rate on first serves, compared to Peer's 44 per cent. Williams also served up six aces, while Peer had none.

A few commentators during the match suggested Peer was still struggling with opponents at Williams' level, even when the better player is not 100 per cent. Peer opened the match with a break and was up 40-0 in the second game, but Williams came back to break her and even the set at 1-1. Peer also lost her final two serves of the first set.

Still, Peer can take comfort that she will likely move up in the rankings to either 13th or 14th, depending on how the remaining players do, which would be her highest ranking ever. Her previous best was 15th in January 2007.

On the bright side, Peer and her Romanian partner Monica Niculescu advanced as far as the quarter-finals. En route, they disposed of the 10th-seeded team of Yung-Jan Chan of Taiwan and her Chinese partner, Zheng Zie.

Their run ended in the quarter-finals with 2-6 and 4-6 losses to the Spanish duo of Nuria Llagostera Vives and Maria Jose Martinez Sanchez.

Women big buyers of book aimed at men

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Elliot Katz, a Toronto speechwriter and author, is on a mission to help save marriages.

A divorced father of two daughters who works full time as a policy analyst for the Ontario government, Katz is the author of Being the Strong Man a Woman Wants: Timeless Wisdom on Being a Man (Award Press.)

He is the author of other non-fiction books, including Great Country Walks Around Toronto, The Great Toronto Bicycling Guide and The Complete Guide to Walking in Canada.

Elliot Katz

Katz said that after his divorce, he asked himself what he could learn from the experience.

"I went right to the sources, including the Talmud, and learned that many men are confused about how to behave. Wives are frustrated because their husbands are... too easygoing, and they leave all decision-making to their wives."

His goal in writing the book, which is now translated into 19 languages, including Spanish, Polish and Hindi, is to teach men that it is "not Jewish to be a nebish."

The 110-page book is written as a conversation between a grandson and his grandfather on the grandfather's 50th wedding anniversary. The grandson wants to know how his grandparents' marriage lasted so long.

His grandfather replies that he had to learn about being a a husband, and in each subsequent chapter, he shares his knowledge with his grandson.

The grandfather said he learned early on that his wife wanted a strong man. "If I wasn't strong, if I didn't make decisions, she lost respect for me. The irony is that if you're just always trying to please her, you don't please her at all."

He stresses, however, that being strong is not being controlling. "It's taking responsibility for what's going on, taking charge and finding solutions. It's putting the greater good for your relationship and your family ahead of your own wants. Being controlling is thinking only about what you want and is often a sign of insecurity."

If you avoid making decisions, the grandfather said that your wife "may feel you're avoiding responsibilities. Being strong means stepping forward to make decisions in difficult situations and taking responsibility for the outcome."

Katz has done about 90 radio interviews for stations as far away as Singapore, has appeared on Rogers TV's Dating 201, a weekly show that profiles Toronto's dating scene, as well as on Citytv's Breakfast Television and CHCH-TV news.

He said that although he wrote the book for men, it is women who are buying it. "One radio host started off by saying he doesn't agree with me and asked for callers. He only had women callers, and they all agreed with the book."

He stresses that the book is not a money-making venture. "My goal is tikkun olam. I'm on a mission to teach men how to be men."

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

My friend Rhonda and I go back to when we were in school. We graduated together, dated together and still live near each other. We have been through much in our lives, as we are now both in our 40s.

Rhonda has been through a divorce, illness, loss, kid problems, financial problems. I was at her side every step of the way. I took time off work, time away from my family and dropped everything when she needed me.

Now I have been going through a rough time, and where is Rhonda? She's either too busy or just going out, has to meet her kids, has an appointment. She's one of those people who says, "Let me know if you need anything," but doesn't really mean it. She's always around for dinner or shopping though. I think I've had enough. Am I being hasty?

One-Way Friendship

Dear One-Way Friendship

People's lives often take different paths, and priorities for each other may have changed. However, it sounds as though Rhonda may be what's called a fair weather friend – a friend who comes around when it suits her, but will rarely put herself out. Most probably a selfish person who is focused on her own needs.

Spotting one of these friends can not only be tricky, but can take time. They may often sound concerned when you talk about a problem, but will rarely, if ever, turn their pseudo-concern into action. The problem here though is not Rhonda's, it's yours.

A big part of friendship is expectations. Yours are not being met. It's not wrong to be able to lean on a good friend. Friendship is all about give and take, and it can take years to really know who's giving and who's taking. If Rhonda never comes through for you, then you have your answer.

Now what do you do about it? Avoid her? Tell her? Ignore her calls? The long history you have together warrants one final heart to heart. Let her know how you feel, and in your own mind close the door to those unmet expectations you had for this friend. You can still remain acquaintances if you choose to, but you must make that call. Once your expectations become more realistic, you will be far more at ease when it comes to Rhonda.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN, *e-mail. ella@cjnews.com. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. Dealing with a bully

What do you do when you have a bully in your midst? It doesn't matter if you're a child, or an adult, if it's at work at the water cooler, or in your personal life, there are people who, sadly, are not happy with themselves and want to undermine your happiness and success.

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

What do you when you encounter a person like this? No matter what, always remember the phrase, "Don't let anyone steal your happiness." That is the best place to start.

There are people who are uncomfortable by your success, your happiness and peace of mind, and you have to hold onto your own empowerment and know that you deserve all that is good and loving. Stay empowered. Often in a bullying situation, the bully tries to take your power away. Take it back. It's not theirs to take. Step into your power and allow yourself to soar.

According to David Kinchin from the U.K. National Workplace Bullying, "Often the bully has a Jekyll and Hyde nature, they are unbelievably innocent and charming in front of witnesses, and so no one wants to believe this individual has a vicious and vindictive nature in private," he says.

"Only the current targets see both sides. The bully is a convincing, compulsive liar and when called to account, will make up anything spontaneously to fit their needs at that moment. They use lots of charm and are always plausible and convincing when peers, superiors or others are present: the motive of the charm is deception, and its purpose is to compensate for a lack of empathy. They excel at deception."

So often it takes awhile to notice the bully, but in the book The Bully in the Relationship: Stop Emotional Abuse and Get the Love You Deserve, Anne-Renee Testa writes, "Remember, we've defined bullying as any repeated behaviour that degrades, denigrates and otherwise makes you feel badly about yourself, ranging from the most blatant insults to the subtlest criticism." Testa then goes on to list the most common types of bullies, with information about how they operate and what makes them tick, and how they carry forward the rage of generations.

So once you've defined who they are, how can you protect and empower yourself?

Testa has a formula called ART, in which you, "A," acknowledge the problem, letting go of denial, justification and excuses, and, "R," in which you reassess your options, looking hard at your present and future. And finally the "T," which is take action to develop a strategy that will transform your life.

In the book, Testa helps the reader identify "that sick, sinking feeling in their gut that tells them something is terribly wrong and helps them reassess their options and strengthen their behaviour in the relationship, and finally how to break the victim mode and change the old mindset."

Empower yourself by changing your perspective and realizing you are not powerless or stuck at all. Think of times in your life when you overcame huge odds and survived difficulty with great aplomb. List your strengths and best characteristics, and affirm them to yourself often. And, finally, take some action, and you will feel even more empowered than ever before.

Remember, those who can, do; those who can't, bully.

Canadian joins Israeli flotilla probe

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Canadian was included in the five-person commission of inquiry appointed by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu earlier this week to investigate the May 31 Gaza flotilla clash.

Former Canadian Armed Forces judge advocate general Ken Watkin will be one of two observers on the commission. Northern Irish Nobel Peace Prize laureate David Trimble is the other.

Watkin, the former head of the Canadian military's judiciary, holds the rank of brigadier-general. He was legal adviser to a Canadian military/civilian board of inquiry investigating the activities of the Canadian Airborne Regiment Battle Group in Somalia. From 1995 to 2005, he served as counsel in various investigations and inquiries arising from the 1994 genocide in Rwanda. He has also served as legal adviser to the Canadian navy and to Canadian commanders in Bosnia.

Netanyahu said at the start of Monday's cabinet meeting that the main goal of the Gaza flotilla probe is to prove to the world that the Israeli naval forces' operation on the Gaza-bound aid ship was appropriate and met international standards.

"The government decision will make it clear to the world that Israel is acting legally, responsibly and with complete transparency," Netanyahu said.

The cabinet unanimously approved the establishment of the commission.

Netanyahu told the ministers it was particularly important to announce the Gaza flotilla probe panel on Sunday and to have it approved on Monday, since the foreign ministers of the European Union were convening Sunday to discuss the events that led up to the Israel Defence Forces raid on the Gaza-bound flotilla.

Knesset conversion bill stalled, minister says

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Yuli Edelstein had a full agenda when he accompanied Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to Canada last month. As minister of public affairs and the Diaspora, he had planned to meet community leaders, fundraisers, students and activists to discuss the controversial conversion bill as well as strategies for attracting more young people to Zionism.

That changed with the May 31 Gaza flotilla incident. Edelstein cut short his Canadian visit, heading south to speak to U.S. media outlets and present Israel's side of the story.

Reached by phone prior to his return to Israel, Edelstein said the conversion bill, which prompted angry reactions in the Diaspora, is now dormant. "The legislation is in the Knesset, and it is basically stuck," with no prospect of passage, he said. "Our goal is to kill it."

As initially presented, the bill had some admirable provisions – it allowed local rabbis across the country to perform conversions and thus to better integrate thousands of mostly Russian immigrants into Israeli society.

But Edelstein said that "a couple of paragraphs were added that worried Diaspora Jews. One would change the Law of Return by not granting citizenship to immigrants who were converted in Israel [contrary to Jewish law, which draws no distinctions between converts and born Jews] and it granted the Chief Rabbinate exclusive right to approve conversions.

"There is no danger the legislation will pass as it looks right now. The prime minister consulted on this issue in Israel, and this is his position too," Edelstein said. "Now, the downside is that if the legislation is killed, there will be no positive change on conversions, so we are looking for a way out of it."

An informal group that includes Natan Sharansky, chair of the Jewish Agency, is studying the problem and looking for a solution, Edelstein said.

The News in Brief

Canada

IHH Ban Urged

TORONTO — The Turkish group that helped fund and organize the flotilla that tried to break Israel's blockade of Gaza and clashed violently with Israeli naval forces on May 31 should be designated a terrorist entity under Canadian law, B'nai Brith Canada says. B'nai Brith is circulating an online petition and has sent a brief to Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Opposition Leader Michael Ignatieff, urging them both to support designating the "radical Turkish Islamist organization" IHH as a terrorist entity, which, among other things, would make it illegal for anyone to raise funds for it in Canada. B'nai Brith said the brief, "which was based on numerous credible reports, highlighted the IHH's links to the global jihadi movement, its close ties to Hamas, its support for Al Qaeda, and its connection to various terror plots," including "the Canadian-linked Millennium Bomber terrorist plot."

YU Fetes Canadians

TORONTO — Yeshiva University honoured five Canadians at a special convocation dinner in Toronto June 13. YU gave honorary doctorates to Supreme Court Judge Rosalie Abella, Senator Linda Frum, B.C. philanthropist Samuel Belzberg and Rabbi Morton Green of Hamilton, Ont. Toronto lawyer Alan Litwack received YU's Distinguished Alumnus Award.

Taxi Clutter Cited

MONTREAL — Arieh Perecowicz's cab is too cluttered and that's led to fines, a taxi inspector testified in Municipal Court as the veteran driver's trial continued last week. Since 2006, the Cote St. Luc cabbie, 66, has racked up more than $1,400 in fines and is fighting a Montreal taxi bureau bylaw that bars items in his cab not related to work, including his Jewish religious articles. Perecowicz, who is handling his own defence, is citing religious freedom and wants $5,000 from the city for the "discriminatory and unlawful" bylaw. The trial continues in December.

World

Yahoo Reunites J-lem

JERUSALEM — In response to a call from the Simon Wiesenthal Center and the Israeli government, Yahoo changed its portal site's weather listings and its iPhone weather application to show one united Jerusalem. After a change earlier this month, users of the application had to choose between west Jerusalem and east Jerusalem, West Bank, to get the weather for the city. Information for both was identical and came from the same weather station, identified as being in Jerusalem, Israel.

Rubashkin Acquitted

DES MOINES — Kosher meat-packing executive Sholom Rubashkin was acquitted in an Iowa court of child labour violations after a month-long trial. He was found not guilty on all 67 counts relating to 26 South American teens who worked at the Agriprocessors kosher meat-packing plant in Postville, Iowa. Rubashkin was convicted last November on 86 federal fraud charges in connection with the plant. His sentencing in that case is this month. The plant was the site of a 2008 immigration raid by U.S. officials in which 389 illegal immigrants, including 31 children, were arrested.

Exam Question Creates Bias: B'nai Brith

WINNIPEG — A question on a provincial exam for 12th-graders in Manitoba will promote anti-Israel sentiment, B'nai Brith Canada says.

Chantal Kreviazuk

The question – "Explain whether or not you think people in the entertainment industry have a responsibility for making the world a better place?" – was in response to an article written by Canadian singer Chantal Kreviazuk in which she deplored the suffering of children in several armed conflicts, including those killed and maimed in the Gaza Strip by an artillery shell.

B'nai Brith alleged that the question will promote anti-Israel feelings, the Winnipeg Free Press reported, and wants the Department of Education to check every student's paper and count the anti-Israel comments.

Winnipeg-based B'nai Brith Midwest region director Alan Yusim told the Free Press that most students would not have the knowledge to conclude anything other than that Israel victimized children. "I don't see which other conclusion you could reach," Yusim said.

Manitoba Education Minister Nancy Allan said she shares B'nai Brith's concern and has told department officials to find out how the question got on the exam and how "to make sure this doesn't happen again."

A number of entertainers have cancelled shows in Israel this summer, some in response to the Gaza flotilla incident. The alternative rock band the Pixies was the latest act to pull out, joining the likes of Elvis Costello, Klaxons and Gorillaz Sound System. Others, including Elton John and Rod Stewart, still plan to play Israel this summer.

Pride still considering QuAIA application

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Controversy continued to swirl around organizers of the Toronto Pride parade late last week, after it was revealed that an application by the group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) was still under consideration.

Tracey Sandilands, executive director of Pride Toronto, confirmed to The CJN via e-mail that although Pride's board had recently decided to ban the term "Israeli apartheid" from all Pride events – ostensibly preventing QuAIA from participating, at least under its current name – as of last week, the group's application was still under review.

Justine Apple

Though prospective parade participants initially had only until June 4 to apply for entry in the July 4 parade, Sandilands told The CJN her organization had extended the application deadline to allow more groups to bring forward submissions "in an effort to draw in those groups that were reluctant to participate because of QuAIA's presence."

She added that since Pride announced its decision to ban QuAIA, "many more applications have come in."

It was unclear how QuAIA's application could still be under consideration if its slogan was banned by Pride.

In a June 7 statement, Pride said it had received many complaints from participants who felt the atmosphere of the parade became "unsafe" with the presence of QuAIA, a key factor in Pride's decision to ban the offending terminology.

"For that reason, we asked members of QuAIA to re-evaluate their approach when participating in Pride activities," the statement said, adding: "QuAIA is not being banned from this year's festival. We are restricting the use of words and phrases that can promote a poisonous atmosphere and detract from the goal of celebrating diversity within our community. No Canadian, queer or straight, should have to worry about their safety in a public space because of who they are or what they believe."

Queries to Pride asking which groups had applied to be in the parade since the decision to ban the term "Israeli apartheid," as well as asking when the deadline for parade applications had been extended to, went unanswered by The CJN's deadline.

As of last Friday, Pride's website still named June 4 as the application deadline.

Also in its statement, Pride reiterated the reasoning behind its decision to prohibit the QuAIA slogan.

"Our decision to restrict the use of the words 'Israeli apartheid' was not made easily, independently or absent of a commitment to respectful expression. Let us be clear: criticism of Israeli government policy is legitimate. However, the atmosphere created by the use of the words 'Israeli apartheid' in the last three years of the Pride Festival are not," Pride said.

Asked if QuAIA would indeed review its approach to the parade or whether it had submitted a revised application to Pride, Elle Flanders, a spokesperson for the group, wrote by e-mail that it would participate as part of a "broad-based coalition of thousands (no longer only QuAIA) marching for free speech at Pride, those who believe in political speech and members of the LGBT [lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered] community that are not merely 'parading' to be spectacles, but who have something to say."

The group, calling itself the Pride Coalition for Free Speech, first appeared on Facebook on May 23, and last week had more than 900 followers on the site.

See, discover, feel, learn, enjoy

From the editor's desk...

One of the most beautiful women in the Middle East is in Zippori, in the lower western Galilee of Israel. Her stunning, stark, good looks are simply, mesmerizing. Her dreamy, contemplative expression invites rather long, uncomfortable bouts of staring.

But no one knows her name. Because of that she has become known as the Mona Lisa of Zippori, which is somewhat unfair since she is older than Da Vinci's Mona Lisa by some 1,200 years. By all rights, it is Mona Lisa who should be known as Da Vinci's Zippori maiden.

That we cannot identify her or know any of the details of her life we yearn to have at our fingertips merely adds to the woman's mystery.

Her rare, astonishing beauty is, however, immortalized in the breath-takingly expert craftsmanship of an unknown mosaic tile worker or workers. Some time in the third century CE, he, she or they captured the woman's likeness in a mosaic tile floor in a large house in the city of Zippori. Though the city was destroyed in an earthquake in 363 CE, the mosaic floor remained mostly intact. More than 1,600 years after the earthquake it was found, uncovered and washed.

The mysteriously beautiful face and charm of Zippori's Mona Lisa were discovered and presented to the entire world to behold and ponder. But it is not just the very attractive "Mona Lisa" who comes alive in the Zippori National Park. Indeed, a large part of the thoroughfares of life in the ancient city of Zippori open to the imagination and curiosity of the visitor as a result of the archeological excavations at the Zippori National Park.

Of course, archeological excavations are to Israel as the ocean is to Jacques Cousteau. It is part of the very essence and definition of the place.

Wherever one visits in Israel, there is history underfoot. And wherever there is history underfoot – which means almost everywhere in Israel – archeologists will want to dig and explore.

On a recent much-too-brief trip to Israel, The CJN was invited to experience the particularly impressive archeological excavations in three ancient communities along a triangular geographic seam starting in Beit She'an near the Jordan River, south of the Sea of Galilee, then northwest to Zippori in the lower Galilee and southwest to Caesarea on the shore of the Mediterranean.

The focus of the three-excavation trip was to "feel" the historical intersection of Jewish and Roman societies. It was a veritable breakneck shoot through the rapids of non-stop exhilaration. "See, discover, feel, learn, enjoy" aptly summarizes the nature of the experience.

Beit She'an had its origins hundreds of years before the Romans arrived on the scene. But it is the remnant of the vast Roman city that is now impressively on display in the Beit She'an National Park.

Mona Lisa of Zippori

Long before Tel Aviv became famous as a "White City" in the mid-1930s, Beit She'an-Scythopolis was known as the White City of the area. The walls of the buildings, structures, edifices and columns were covered in either white limestone or imported marble.

The ancient Roman city on whose former major streets and commercial biways visitors stroll today was essentially built in the second century CE.

Standing in the amphitheatre, the largest in Israel, one is overwhelmed by the sense of spatial grandeur and peace. Seven aqueducts served the city. The national park covers an area of some 400 acres. Zippori and Beit She'an were devastated by the earthquake of 363 CE.

Like Beit She'an, Caesarea's history predates the Romans by many hundreds of years. But its chief renown and glory was as a Roman-era city. "Caesarea was a planned city, with a network of crisscrossing roads, a temple, a theatre, an amphitheatre, markets and residential quarters," the tour guide told The CJN.

It was in Caesarea, most believe, that the Romans tortured and murdered the Akiva group of rabbis during the Bar Kochba revolt. But the city itself lived longer than either Zippori or Beit She'an. The Mamelukes captured and destroyed it in the 13th century.

"Typically, the ancient Romans built not just for function. They built for show," The CJN was told. "They intended what they built to impress their power upon others, as if to say: resistance was futile. Thus, for the Romans, appearances counted for a great deal."

For Jews, of course, the opposite has always been true. Apart from the Temple in Jerusalem, which the Romans destroyed, appearances have never been paramount. The chief Power, the chief Authority, the chief Grandeur has always been invisible, unknowable and beyond the reach of the artist's, architect's or city planner's imagination.

This too then, is one of the key discoveries one makes along the many, exciting archeological trails of Israel: despite their vast and intimidating power, ancient Rome vanished. All the ancient powers vanished.

But Israel – the idea, the people – did not. The greatest of all the ancient powers was and remains the Power of the ethical monotheism of ancient Judea.

Hate, terrorist websites on the rise

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Like the proverbial double-edged sword, the Internet can be a force for good and for malevolence.

Illustrating that old saw, Rabbi Abraham Cooper pointed out how $1 billion was raised online to aid victims of the Haitian earthquake. At the same time, as Israel responded to the crisis by dispatching a rapid response team, YouTube ran videos claiming Israel's real purpose in establishing a mobile hospital unit was to harvest the organs of hapless Haitians.

"Press TV, an Iranian website, picked it up and ran with it," demonstrating that the web "is an incubator of hatred and is just not going away," Rabbi Cooper said.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper

The Los Angeles-based rabbi, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, offered his analysis as part of the Canadian release of Digital Terrorism and Hate 2010 – The Global Reach. The CD presents the centre's most recent findings on online extremism. Some "11,500 problematic hate and terrorist websites and other Internet postings" were found by centre researchers, a 20 per cent increase over the year before, Rabbi Cooper said.

"Internet-based hate has inspired some of the most violent hate crimes in America," the centre reported. "The Internet continues to be used to demean and threaten African-Americans, Jews, immigrants, gays and virtually every religious denomination."

Social-networking media are becoming more significant in the spread of hate message online, Rabbi Cooper said, with some images or videos going "viral" and being seen by thousands of viewers on sites such as Facebook. That amplifies the impact such videos can have, he suggested.

"Everyone is on Facebook," Rabbi Cooper continued. "It gives a sense of community, a sense of validation and a sense of adventure for young people looking at things they shouldn't."

Demonstrating the potential dangers of Internet videos, Rabbi Cooper focused on a site that provides instructions on how to make a simple though deadly bomb from household ingredients. The explosive, about the size of a walnut, is placed next to a watermelon and a fuse lit. Once heated, the device completely obliterates the watermelon.

Some of the sites cater to the white supremacist viewpoint, while others present a radical Islamic message, he showed. He pointed out that the Islamic terrorists behind the Madrid train bombings used the Internet to coordinate their attacks.

He said online games that often target minority groups, such as immigrants and Jews, give a "sense of empowerment" and "validation" to people who view these groups as problematic.

"Young people are playing the games and are aware of the Internet. Adults have a lot of catching up to do," he said.

A phenomenon that has come to characterize proponents of extremist websites is that of the "lone wolf," Rabbi Cooper said. After failing to generate mass movements, extremists adopted a "leaderless resistance" approach, in which individuals, motivated by online messaging, act alone against their perceived enemies.

"Now, you find individuals ready to act out terrorist attacks in the name of an ideology," Rabbi Cooper said. "This presents a tremendous challenge to those of us who want minimal government intervention."

Rabbi Cooper was joined by lawyer and gay activist Martin Gladstone; Ashley McFarlane, a communications practitioner with the Urban Alliance on Race Relations and Cathy Wing, co-executive director of the Media Awareness Network.

Pomegranate wines you should try

BY YONATAN STERNBERG

Although the terms wine and vino are traditionally defined as beverages made solely from grapes, "fruit wine" or sheichar in Hebrew, can be produced from any fruit with a sufficient natural sugar content, or by adding sugar or honey to the nectar.

The pomegranate (Punica granatum) is considered one of Israel's oldest fruit species. Originating in Persia (Iran) and the Himalayan region, pomegranates, it is believed, were first cultivated in the Middle East some time around the Bronze Age. The Bible also describes Israel as a land blessed with seven fruits and grains (shivat haminim): "A land of wheat and barley, and [grape] vines and fig-trees and pomegranates; a land of olive-trees and [date] honey." (Deuteronomy 8:8)

From the Bible, and through paintings and sculptures of the Middle Ages and ancient Greek mythology, it seems that the pomegranate has been given a special status among fruits.

'Cheer up' Gissin tells supporters of Israel

Community meeting draws over 700

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Israel will survive the vitriol and opprobrium that's been directed at it by much of the international community over the last couple of weeks, because its actions in the face of Gaza blockade-runners are both just and necessary.

That's the message more than 700 people heard at Adath Israel Congregation on the evening of June 7 from Israel's consul general for Toronto and western Canada, Amir Gissin, who discussed Israel's response to current world opinion.

The event, organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, was billed as a "community briefing on the Gaza flotilla confrontation" and aimed to highlight ways to combat negative perception caused by the May 31 high-seas confrontation .

Other speakers at the briefing included Col. Richard Kemp, former commander of British forces in Afghanistan; Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, and Noah Kochman and Rebecca Chernak of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students.

Speaking to The CJN last week, summing up his thoughts on his presentation to the community, Gissin encouraged those who may be feeling despondent about Israel's portrayal on the world stage to "cheer up."

Israel, he said, has had its share of "serious problems" in the past and has always triumphed over adversity through its own strengths and the "unshakeable support" of the worldwide Jewish community.

"Despite the fact that this [Gaza flotilla] situation is perceived as a serious public opinion crisis" Israel's belief in its right to self-defence remains steadfast, he said.

In addition, Gissin reminded the community that Israel has been fighting two concurrent wars for many years.

The first is in the form of ongoing military operations on the ground in Israel. IDF skirmishes with, and defensive manouevres against, Hamas, Hezbollah and other terrorist groups in the region represent the more overt front of these wars.

The more insidious front comes in the form of an all-out public relations war, he said.

"This concept of Israel always using excessive power is unfortunately a narrative that our enemies are working very hard to establish," he said. "In this sense, the [Gaza flotilla raid] played into their hands. We should assess this and understand that this is also a war, like the physical one, and fight back similarly."

To do that, Gissin said he suggested that Israel and all of its supporters should continue to distribute material such as video, still photos and information "that prove the real intention and ruthlessness of our enemies. Expose the connection between... terrorist organizations, Iran and those on the flotilla."

Iran, he said, is working diligently to deflect attention away from its pursuit of nuclear weapons, and the Gaza flotilla has become the perfect way to distract the world's attention away from its own plans.

Amir Gissin

In his remarks, Farber declared that the Jewish community will never "accept the fantasy" that Israel is a "devil state," as its detractors portray it.

"We will not accept the explicit notion that Israel is forbidden to protect itself, nor will we accept the implicit notion that the only good Jew is a subservient one, or a dead one. We will not accept the notion that the rules which apply to every other nation in the world are somehow suspended in their application where Israel is concerned. We have the right to defend ourselves from those who would do us harm," he said.

Gissin said it was important for Canadians to remember that within the last month, two events highlighting Israel's importance to Canada took place.

The first was Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's economic mission to Israel. The trip was portrayed as a great success by the premier, with businesses from Ontario's health and science sector signing numerous memorandums of understanding and contracts with Israeli counterparts.

The second was the working visit to Canada last month by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the first such visit by a sitting Israeli premier in 16 years.

"These [events] emphasize how much our two countries have in common, how much potential there is for mutual economic co-operation and how much Israel is relevant to Canada in terms of commerce, culture and social development," Gissin said.

He added that although "at this moment in time" Israel is seen through the prism of the Gaza flotilla clash, "time will pass and we'll continue to build on the strong foundations that were lately developed.

"We have to be patient and remember that here in Toronto, people are constantly being exposed to the virtues of Israel and we will recover from the international condemnation being unjustly levelled at us. We will prevail and return quickly to a time where the positive qualities of Israel will be exposed."

Anniversary, alarm, present danger

One year ago on June 12, the people of Iran went to the polls to elect a new government. The outcome, as the world saw, was a bloody sham. The results of the voting were pre-ordained by the ruling theocrats to ensure the return of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to the presidency.

Incensed at the brazen mistreatment by their government, large number of Iranians took to the streets in peaceful protest to express their anger and to register their protest at the patently dishonest behaviour.

Incensed at the brazen effrontery of the people deigning to challenge the announced election results, the government also took to the streets. Ahmadinejad let loose the much-feared zealot force of Revolutionary Guards to quell the protests.

The result was violence and bloodshed on a scale in the streets of Tehran and other Iranian cities not seen there for decades. Typical of the responses of all totalitarian regimes, mass arrests, detentions and show trials ensued. Two people were executed. Scores of detainees remain in jail to this day, one year later.

Payam Akhavan, a professor of international law at McGill University, wrote last week in the Globe and Mail that "having brutally crushed this non-violent 'green movement,' Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's regime will mark this occasion with the show trial of seven leaders of the persecuted Baha'i minority on charges of espionage for Israel and plotting against the Islamic Republic. It is yet another desperate attempt to portray widespread opposition to authoritarianism as a foreign policy."

That the Iranian regime was able to brutalize its own people last year with such impunity from the human rights-championing West – and that it continues to do so – was a shameful, yet revealing demonstration of western impotence in the face of a brutish regime.

That the United Nations Economic and Social Council recently elected Iran to serve a four-year term beginning in 2011 on the commission on the status of women merely underscores the emptiness of western rhetoric regarding the sanctity of universal human rights when faced with the cynicism and indifference of a powerful trampler of those rights.

Last week, Montreal MP Irwin Cotler, in the House of Commons, tabled a petition with hundreds of signatures of Canadians that were collected by various Jewish organizations and congregations. It was a plea to the Canadian government as well as to the world, "to act against the Iranian regime's clear and present danger to international peace and security and increasingly… to the Iranian people."

The Canadian government has indeed taken strong stands against Tehran for its oppressive and repressive behaviour. That is why the plea of the many petitioners must be supported.

The one-year anniversary of the sham elections is an appropriate occasion to recall the Iranians who were cut down by Ahmadinejad and his men and that so many Iranians continue to be cut down even today.

The anniversary also sounds an alarm. In the words of the many petitioners, Tehran is a clear and present danger to the entire world.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israel mourned 19 children and four adults who died when a passenger train slammed into a busload of seventh graders from Petach Tikvah that had stalled on a railroad crossing near Haifa. They were headed to a seashore nature preserve.

Iran to sit on UN women's committee

Your newspaper did not report that on April 29, the United Nations Economic and Social Council elected Iran to serve a four-year term, beginning in 2011, on the Commission on the Status of Women. The UN calls the commission "the principal global policy-making body" on women's rights and claims it is "dedicated exclusively to gender equality and advancement of women."

A 2009 U.S. State Department report on Iran outlines Iran's women's rights credentials. For example, spousal rape is not illegal. Four male witnesses or three men and two women are required for conviction of rape. A woman or man found making a false accusation of rape is subject to 80 lashes. Further, according to the State Department report, "a man may escape punishment for killing a wife caught in the act of adultery if he is certain she was a consenting partner." The testimony of two women is equal to that of one man. A woman has the right to divorce only if her husband signs a contract granting that right, cannot provide for his family, or is a drug addict, insane or impotent. A husband is not required to cite a reason for divorcing his wife. The election of Iran to a committee dealing with Women's Rights is another glaring example of the hypocrisy of the United Nations. Women's groups in Canada and everyone else should be screaming at this outrage and to this affront of the protection of women's rights.

New Israel Fund defended

The current heavily financed attack on the New Israel Fund in the Jewish press and in literature distributed in Jewish bookshops and Orthodox synagogues shows that the Jewish right wing has learned lessons from Arab propaganda. "La patrie en danger!" is the perennial rallying cry of the right wing, diverting attention from problems at home by accusing political opponents of being terrorists. But ignoring Israel's real problems of poverty, inequality, degradation of resources and the environment, and suppressing the needs of "minorities" (which include women and the non-Orthodox) will in the long run only weaken Israeli society, not strengthen it.

Defending God in the face of evil

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz derives from a verse in the Bible that "man instinctively resists evil" ("Lighting a candle in the dark," May 6). The Torah also states that man is inherently evil (Genesis 6:5, 8:21). In any case, Rabbi Steinmetz confronts the age-old question of theodicy – defending God in the face of evil. Although Judaism doesn't provide the solution when man is brutalized by man or nature, its scriptures, more than their counterparts in Christianity and Islam, provide many of the resources to grapple with this issue. There's the classic biblical book Job and the healing power of the 23rd Psalm, which have comforted so many Jews and Christians.

In addition, there was Aaron's reaction to the death of his two sons while performing sacred work was utter silence and acceptance of the divine will (Leviticus 10:3); the passage stating that Mother Earth will turn cruel, describing the penalties for rejecting God (Leviticus, chapter 26); God's declarations that He will totally conceal Himself (Deuteronomy 31:18), as was so apparent during the Holocaust; and the statement, "I will be with him in trouble" (Psalm 91:15).

During Musaf on Yom Kippur, one recites the prayer of the high priest in the Temple. He prayed for the welfare of the Jews in the new year, including residents of Sharon in ancient Israel, who lived on unstable land, that "their homes should not become their graves" – which is the calamity that befell people in Haiti on Jan. 12.

Criticizing Israel

On the evening of May 15, more than 1,100 Israeli Jews assembled at Zion Square in Jerusalem to protest Israel's continued immoral and illegal occupation of the West Bank and Gaza. Carrying signs that read "Zionists are not Settlers," the crowd chanted, sang and waved flags. As a Canadian Jew present, I saw it as a turning point: I was told that this was the biggest pro-peace demonstration in Jerusalem in at least a decade.

No one called these protesters self-hating Jews or anti-Semites, or questioned their allegiance to Israel or their right to demonstrate. Any similar actions in Canada are met with epithets and denials by other Jews. Demonstrations or even raising a criticism of Israel garner nasty articles in your paper and others. What accounts for this difference? One would think that the Israeli Jews are fully aware of how their actions can sway or alter the course of their country's political life. Here in Canada, our actions are merely rhetorical – we demonstrate from afar yet we have little real influence. But our punishment by the Jewish "establishment" is far more severe here than any suffered by Jews in Israel. Why is that?

Birth amidst death: Toronto woman's son born in Dachau

By ALLAN GOULD

Certain things are expected in certain places. Graveyards are for the dead, and as we all know, between 1939 and 1945, Europe became a Jewish graveyard. More than six decades after the slaughter, it is hard to imagine anything can still surprise us.

Yet there is one astonishing story that has only recently come to light: a handful of births occurred in the centre of the Holocaust kingdom itself. On April 28, 1945, a group of American soldiers broke into Kaufering I, one of 11 satellites of Dachau. Dachau was one of the first concentration camps set up within weeks of Hitler's appointment as German chancellor in January 1933. Several of the liberators were African-American, descendants of slaves.

"Everywhere lay the dead," wrote one of these soldiers in a letter home. "But among the more than 30,000 prisoners who were liberated, to our great surprise, we came across seven Jewish mothers and their babies!" The men reached for their cameras, photographing what their eyes and minds could not accept: seven infants, all born between December 1944 and February 1945 had miraculously survived. In Dachau's dozen years of existence, more than 200,000 European Jews were imprisoned there, of whom over 40,000 were murdered. Yet new life was discovered amidst the piles of dead, a kind of grotesque oxymoron.

There is a Canadian connection, captured in a new documentary that ran on German television in late April. One of the seven new mothers was Miriam Rosenthal, now 87, who has lived in Toronto with her husband and three children since the 1970s. She is one of only two of those pregnant Jews who are still alive. Her son, Leslie, born amidst the death, is a Toronto-based property manager.

Leslie Rosenthal and his wife, Annette, parents of four and grandparents of nine, were flown to Germany for the 65th commemoration of Dachau's liberation, joined by four others of the seven original babies. They stayed in a Munich hotel, 40 kilometres from the infamous death camp, both weeping as they watched Geboren im KZ (Born in a Concentration Camp) on TV, the documentary featuring his mother and himself, along with nearly a million non-Jews across Germany and Switzerland. Births amidst death: the most hopeful event of that evil place and time.

Miriam Rosenthal's youth, spent near the town of Komarno in southern Czechoslovakia, was deeply religious. She is youngest of 14 children born to a gentleman farmer and his wife. Her family fed many of the local yeshiva boys, married off poor girls lacking dowries, and secretly delivered chickens and schmaltz to impoverished neighbours. "The poor would always be invited to our Shabbas table," Rosenthal recalls. Hungarian and German were spoken at home, so she laughs when recalling how, in Canada after the war, Jews would declare, "You don't speak Yiddish? What kind of a Jew are you?"

Her father died shortly before Hitler destroyed her family's world, but he had lived to see 12 of his 14 children married. All of Miriam's brothers were shipped off to forced labour camps in Hungary, but she was determined to marry her fiancé, a young Jewish scholar named Bela, later William, Rosenthal. A kindly Christian gave Miriam false papers and placed a cross over her neck so she could take a fast train to Miskolc, her beloved's Hungarian town. After midnight on April 5, 1944, the two young Orthodox Jews were married, each wearing a Jewish star. Barely two months later, Miriam Rosenthal was sent to Auschwitz; two months later, she discovered that she was pregnant.

Miriam Rosenthal

Miriam was sent to work in a nearby Messerschmitt airplane factory, where an SS man spotted her large abdomen. "You pig woman! What are you doing here? You are pregnant!" She was to be sent back to Auschwitz to die with her unborn child. The new documentary about the Schwangeren Kommando [Pregnancy Unit] quotes a little known speech that Heinrich Himmler gave on June 21, 1944, the same month that the young Jewish bride had been shipped to Auschwitz: "Yes, some of you ask, 'I totally understand that we are killing the Jews, but [why] women and children?' I have to tell you something: one day, the children will be adults. These hateful Jewish avengers, who are now small but will be grown up later, will harm our children and grandchildren!"

But the Russians had bombed Auschwitz that week, so Rosenthal was sent by train to a penal camp named Kaufering I, near Dachau. There, unbelievably, she and a half dozen other pregnant Jewish women were housed together in a wooden barrack, attended to by Dr. Vadasz, a sickly, anemic Hungarian-Jewish gynecologist. "He started to cry like a child," recalls Miriam in the film: "I have no instruments! I need hot water! Towels! Soap!"

Yet the babies were all born healthy, the first one a boy, on Dec. 8, 1944; the last, Rosenthal's son, Leslie, born on Feb. 28, 1945, making him inarguably the youngest survivor of the Nazi era. "He was a beauty, with blond hair, big blue eyes, and the doctor cried. Everyone cried," Miriam recalls.

The joy was brief, as Rosenthal began to hemorrhage, with a retained placenta, infection and high fever. Dr. Vadasz told the other women that the newest mother would never survive. The mother of the oldest miracle baby, Elisabeth Legmann, declared, "When you are dead, Miriam, I shall raise Leslie." On the other side of the electrified fence where the men were held, Jews were reciting Psalms, and one cried out, "It's Purim!"

Rosenthal recovered, but lacked sufficient milk, so others of the seven "sisters" nursed her newborn son for her. Another woman imprisoned in Kaufering at the same time believes that "the SS wanted to save their own hides. I do not know if it was an order or an individual decision to look after the seven women and their babies." Only recently discovered was an order by the head SS camp physician, signed on March 13, 1945, that all these new mothers and their babies were to be sent to Bergen-Belsen and immediately killed. It was never acted upon.

Miriam eventually made it back to her old home in Czechslovakia, where she was reunited with her husband, returned from a slave labour camp. After 10 months in Paris waiting for papers to the New World, followed by another 10 months in Cuba, they spent a year in Timmins, Ont., where William Rosenthal served as rabbi, followed by Sudbury, Ont., for 16 more years, and finally Toronto. She didn't discuss her war experiences with anyone other than her husband and three children for decades.

In 2009, two German gentiles, Eva Gruberova and Martina Gawaz, contacted Miriam Rosenthal, begging her to let them make a TV film about her and the other improbable survivors. While researching the history of Dachau – her grandfather was a political prisoner murdered there in the mid-30s – Gruberova had come across an original photograph of five of the mothers and their babies, and was haunted by the image.

Rosenthal reluctantly agreed to be filmed, joined by one of the seven children of the Schwangeren Kommando, Marika Novakova of Slovakia – "my camp sister," Leslie Rosenthal calls her – whose mother, Eva, had breast-fed him. Miriam Rosenthal was shocked to hear herself break into fluent German when requested to try; it was the first time since her year in the death camps she had spoken it.

But Rosenthal refused the filmmakers when they invited her to return to Dachau in April 2010 for the planned commemorations. "I could not make myself return to Kaufering. I had sleepless nights thinking about it."

The ceremonies to mark the 65th anniversary of the liberation of Dachau took place on Sunday, May 2, 2010. Some 700 dignitaries were present. There was a ceremony in front of the former crematorium, various addresses by survivors, a wreath-laying ceremony. Horst Kohler, the federal president of the German parliament spoke, as did several other dignitaries. Five of the seven babies born in the concentration camp were present, from Canada, Brazil, Israel, Slovakia and Hungary.

Leslie Rosenthal was moved by the powerful, beautifully designed exhibition based on the documentary film, which is expected to travel to Holocaust memorials around the world, including Warsaw and New York. The documentary film on Miriam Rosenthal and the other mothers, bearing subtitles, will be shown internationally.

Rosenthal was invited to send a brief video of herself, to address the people attending the Munich gathering. In it, the articulate great-grandmother declares with strength: "I send this message to the people of Germany, especially the young people, but also politicians, educators, clergy. We must learn how to understand other suffering nations of the world. We must practise tolerance. Don't be afraid to speak up, don't be complacent."

Nearly three full decades ago, in 1981, Rosenthal honoured me with a lengthy interview for Toronto Life. As we finished, I asked a painful question: how could she remain a committed, Orthodox Jew after what she went through? She looked at me in shock at my query.

"I brought a son back from hell. How can I not believe in God?"

Live long and prosper

"Live Long and Prosper!" That priestly blessing of Spock has stirred some worrisome speculations for me.

Naomi Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Yes, I admit it. I'm an avid Star Trek fan. I'm a fan of the TV series, not the movies, and of the original William Shatner, Leonard Nimoy version. I loved the clear messages of those shows: good guys won, but there were cultural communities that were different from our own and even though they looked and dressed differently, they could be allies and good too.

But to get back to my conundrum, I'm caught by the word "prosper." What do we mean by that?

Clearly, we all hope to live a long time. But under what conditions? Prosperity connotes a sense of thriving, and we usually take that to indicate a sense of material wherewithal. To live long is a good thing if we can afford it, if we can enjoy the long life with the comfort of proper shelter and the necessities of living. Actually, we wouldn't settle in our dreams for the necessities. We'd wish for more than that. We want the comfort of wealth that will allow for the extras – for travel, for luxury, even for extravagance.

Living a long life without the benefit of financial security is not a good end. I have seen the loss of dignity, of self-respect and even of love in the waning of financial resources at end of life crises. Moreover, families charged with the responsibility of caring for aging members can be pulled apart and left forever with bitterness instead of delightful memories.

But perhaps that most important wish for long life, the one that should forever be embedded in the blessing is for health. Aging is a process of increasing disability. After a certain age, it seems as if every day a different part of the body's warranty is up. Fix this, and then go to another doctor. What a boring routine. What a bother. But without good health, the hope for long life is useless. It could turn into a curse. As the saying goes, be careful what you wish for.

Live long and prosper should translate to a prayer for long life with health and a degree of resources. However, instead of waiting for the future, perhaps we need to look to our daily existence. Live today and be grateful. Don't wait for the end of time, because it might not be so great. Long life is advantageous. What I have now is great. Enjoy and be blessed.

We live in the eternity of others

Doonesbury Land, May 29, 2010. Scene: a military hospital somewhere in a war zone, hot and dusty.

The Chaplain stops in to visit a wounded soldier. "Hi Henry, I'm here to check on Maloney." Soldier: "Sorry Ma'am, he just got evac-ed out. Too injured to return to duty," When she looks shocked, he asks,"You OK, ma'am?"

Jenny M. Gellert in Vancouver

Chaplain: "Yeah, I'm just so, so tired of seeing my guys take these hits." She rests her head in her hands.

Soldier: "So who's got your back, ma'am?"

Chaplain, not looking up: "God, supposedly, but she just sits around doing her nails."

I read these words on the U.S. Memorial Day weekend, as American and Canadian soldiers were dying in Afghanistan. It struck me that even in a world full of independent nations, humanity has yet to find better solutions than war. In fact, any day's reading of a newspaper will show us that greed, intolerance, hatred and xenophobia continue to ravage humanity.

We may smile now to ourselves, those of us from the 1960s who believed that change for the better was possible, nay, likely in our lifetimes. That love would conquer war, that the world could be made into a better, healthier, and freer place. As Doonesbury's Chaplain has discovered, none of that has come to pass as we thought it might.

But one does not have to be in a war zone to know loss.

Over the years so many relatives and friends have left my life, most of them far away when the loss occurred. Most of them were younger than me, lost to cancer, or accident, or sudden illness seemingly without cause.

Their deaths left survivors bereft and bewildered, seeing no reason in the suffering their loved ones endured and no comfort for the aching, gaping hole left in their family.

Every Yizkor service, I remember the relatives and friends who have died, mentioning to myself how they mattered to my life. That list grows longer and more painful with each year.

Like the Chaplain, we ask where the reason for these deaths lies. Is there a reason, or is suffering just an illogical, random act of nature? How can we remain unmoved with our lives lessened by the disappearance of ones we loved?

Unlike some other world religions, Judaism doesn't believe in karma or in submission to the unwavering hand of fate. Judaism insists that we have free will, and that our choices in life are our own. Unfortunately, we cannot determine the way in which we will leave this world. Loving families and friends will not stave off the inevitable. Nor does Judaism promise a world free from strife, unless human beings make that happen. It does not preclude bad things happening to good people.

Leon Wieseltier, in his book Kaddish, introduces his memoir of a year spent reciting Kaddish for his father this way:

"After the 12 months of mourning, the rabbis [teach], one must accompany the mention of one's dead father or one's dead mother with the words 'may his [her] memory be for a blessing for life in the world to come.' Modern Jews... say 'May his [her] memory be for a blessing' and they mean a blessing here, upon us. But the rabbis mean a blessing there, upon him [her]. It is a beautiful proposition and an outrageous one. I can believe that the memory of the dead is a blessing here, upon us. Can I believe that it is a blessing there, upon them?"

Perhaps, but maybe not. As usual, the rabbis challenge us to stretch beyond our comfort level. Whatever we choose to believe, recalling the names of the dead renews our memories of them and gives us a second chance to, for that moment, bring them home to us.

After the death of Yehuda Amichai, Israel's foremost poet, his widow opened a box of fragments he left unfinished. Among them:

"Everything that lives and endures for more than a day after we die is eternal.
We live in the eternity of others.
We are their eternity."

A visit to Israel

Every year thousands of Canadians visit Israel. Today, as one of those fortunate Canadians, I am returning from my third visit in the past decade.

When I arrived in Tel Aviv, Israel was in the midst of an international crisis. A flotilla of vessels allegedly containing humanitarian aid and supplies destined to help those living in Gaza was blockaded at sea by the Israel Defence Forces, as it was feared that the vessels contained armaments intended for hostile attacks against Israel.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

It's not surprising that Israel should be proactive in suspecting that the boats might be smuggling arms into Gaza, a parcel of land controlled by the terrorist organization, Hamas. Israel cannot be too careful given that in the past, Israel's neighbours have contributed weaponry that have been used in deadly attacks.

As the IDF soldiers boarded a boat in an attempt to inspect the cargo, they were attacked and beaten. The ensuing altercation resulted in the deaths of nine Turkish nationals. At this time, we do not yet know the true nature of these "aid" vessels or why the people on board attacked the soldiers rather than allowing them to investigate peacefully, but the incident has once again roused the world in its anti-Israel fervour.

As a result of the incident, Turkey took a leading role in the attack on Israel, withdrawing its ambassador and demanding that the matter be dealt with by the UN Security Council. A host of nations joined the bandwagon in the criticism directed at Israel.

Although on a smaller magnitude, this incident is not entirely dissimilar from the events of the Cuban missile crisis of 1962, when the United States launched a blockade in international waters, preventing Russian vessels from delivering nuclear warheads to Cuba.

Israelis are passionate about keeping abreast of the news. Whether it's in academic circles, in family homes or on the beach, one can overhear and participate in heated discussions on any number of topics, among them government policy, IDF activities and international politics.

Notwithstanding this, while the world raged on about the issues, daily life continued in Israel, with little evidence that the crisis existed. Israeli beaches along the Mediterranean shore from Tel Aviv to Netanya were packed with tourists and Israelis alike enjoying the water, sand and sun on a hot day. The markets were crowded, the stores busy, the hotels filled to capacity and industry, in such places as Haifa's "Silicon Valley" continued as usual.

In Jerusalem, there is a dramatic juxtaposition of the old and new – the architecture of beautiful new buildings, the futuristic Bridge of Strings and the old buildings, some of which date back to biblical times. One does not have to be a haredi Jew to be enthralled by the spiritual experience at the Western Wall.

Israel is not just a destination for religious pilgrims and tourists. It's a country that hosts important international gatherings. While in Israel, I had occasion to visit two dynamic universities. I attended a Canada-Israel Bi-National Forum and an international conference, meetings that brought together individuals from several continents to discuss issues related to immigration and social integration.

At the same time, the International Advisory Council of the Israel Democracy Institute held its annual retreat in Jerusalem, an event attended by such notable individuals as former U.S. secretary of state, George Schulz, and Canadian Supreme Court justice, Rosalie Silberman Abella. Coincidently, Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty was on a trade mission to Israel around the same time.

I spent the last two nights of my visit at the newly renovated Savoy Hotel in Tel Aviv – a building with a significant history. In 1975, a party of terrorists stormed the Tel Aviv beach and overtook the original Savoy Hotel. Hostages were taken and innocent people were killed. Since tourists were not willing to stay in a hotel with such a grisly past, for more than 30 years, the building was used to house soldiers. The Savoy was completely gutted, renovated and reopened as a modern hotel a year ago.

It's only through careful vigilance, including a blockade at sea, that Israel can prevent such terrorist attacks from its hostile neighbours.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Amsterdam

Once a congested and atmospheric labyrinth of tenements, factories, open-air stalls, narrow streets and back alleys, Amsterdam's former Jewish quarter, the Jodenhoek, has been swept away by the inexorable tides of time. The epicentre of the Jewish community from the 17th century to World War II, the Jodenhoek was effectively doomed with Germany's invasion of the Netherlands in May 1940.

Sheldon Kirshner in The Netherlands

When the Germans marched in, more than half of the registered 140,000 Jews in the Netherlands lived in Amsterdam, a lively, sophisticated city known for its romantic canals, exquisite architecture and great art museums.

But after the Holocaust, during which 78 per cent of Dutch Jews perished and the Jodenhoek was virtually emptied of its inhabitants, this neighbourhood was subjected to sterile mass redevelopment.

As a result, the Jodenhoek– which is bounded by the Nieuwe Herengracht and the Kloveniersburgwal canals – lost its prewar distinctive character and looks rather bleak today. Nonetheless, local and foreign tourists are still drawn to the Jodenhoek, which was settled by crypto-Jews and Sephardi Jews in the wake of the Spanish Inquisition and by Ashkenazi Jews in the aftermath of pogroms in eastern Europe. By the standards of that period, the Netherlands was a tolerant haven for Jews and dissident Christians alike.

The most historically important building in this district is the venerable Portuguese Synagogue, which is adjacent to the Netherlands Film and Television Academy. Otherwise known as the "Esnoga," the word for synagogue in Portuguese, the synagogue is bulky and clad in brown bricks. As its name suggests, it was founded by Portuguese Jews, many of whom were merchants and traders who played an integral role in the expansion of the Dutch empire in the 17th century.

In reality, the Portuguese Jews were Spanish Jews. But since the Dutch republic was then at war with Spain, Spanish Jews preferred not to be identified with Spain and thus called themselves Portuguese.

My guide, Vera Querido, a descendant of Portuguese Jews, told me that only 600 of some 40,000 Jews in the Netherlands today can claim such ancestry. Prior to the Holocaust, the Netherlands was home to several thousand Portuguese Jews.

The Portuguese Synagogue, with a membership of around 500, 60 per cent of whom are of Portuguese descent, is currently under renovation in an eight million euro project to shore up its foundations.

Designed by Elias Bouman in a broadly neoclassical style, the synagogue was inaugurated in 1675 and was regularly refurbished in the intervening centuries.

The interior is imposing. In old Dutch fashion, the floor was originally covered with fine sand, but nowadays, hardwood is visible. The wooden ceiling is supported by four thick stone columns. Golden brass chandeliers hold more than 1,000 candles, illuminating the benches beneath. Women's galleries, with separate entrances, face each other.

The south side of the synagogue faces a sandy square, Jonas Daniel Meijerplein, which is named after the first practising Jewish lawyer in Amsterdam. It was from here, in February 1941, that 400 Jewish men were transported to their deaths at the Mauthausen concentration camp in Austria.

Protesting the roundup, the illegal Communist party called a strike, joined by transport and dock workers, that the Nazis suppressed. Mari Andiessen's stolid statue of a Dutch worker commemorates that event.

The Jewish Historical Museum is on the opposite side of Jonas Daniel Meijerplein. It is a fusion of four separate restored synagogues that were last in use in 1942, when the Nazi deportations began.

Focusing on Judaism and Jewish culture, the museum tells the story of Dutch Jews through the medium of books, photographs, oil paintings by Jozef Israels – a major 19th-century painter and graphic artist after whom a street in Amsterdam is named – ritual objects, marriage contracts and a 10-minute film of the Jodenhoek made in 1932.

A special exhibit chronicles the life of Rosa Manus, a pillar of the Dutch and international women's movement who died in the Ravensbruck concentration camp in 1943.

Vera Querido

Nearby, on Jodenbreetstsraat, the Broad Street of the Jews, stands Rembrandt House, where the famous Dutch painter lived until he was unable to keep up with his mortgage payments. It was here that Rembrandt supposedly painted his most famous canvas, The Night Watch. Close by, on St. Anthoniebreetstraat, stands an imposing white Italian Renaissance building. Now a library, it is the former residence of Isaac de Pinto, one of the wealthiest Sephardi Jews of the 17th century.

Waterlooplein, the Jodenhoek's central market from 1886 onward, is currently the site of Amsterdam's largest flea market, a warren of stalls brimming with clothes, household items, books, records and antiques.

A statue of Baruch Spinoza, the heretical philosopher excommunicated by the Jewish community, stands next to city hall, as does a black marble monument dedicated to Dutch Jews who resisted the Nazi juggernaut.

This statue pays tribute to Dutch workers who took part in a 1941 strike to protest the deportation of Jews. It stands on the south side of the Portuguese Synagogue.

-[Sheldon Kirshner photos]

A plain, unadorned monument on Wesperstraat pays homage to Dutch "protectors" of Jews.

Probably the single most important memorial commemorating the Holocaust is the Hollandsche Schouwburg, in the leafy and sedate Plantage district. Since many Jews resided in Plantage before the Nazi occupation, the Nazis put the late 19th-century theatre to use as a deportation centre from August 1942 until November 1943.

The theatre, with its ample auditorium, was pulled down in 1962. Four brick walls were left standing in honour of the 107,000 Dutch Jews who were murdered during the Holocaust. On the walls are black and white photographs of prewar Jewish life in the Netherlands.

The Nazi persecution of Jews is recounted in an exhibition of photographs, documents and videos on the first floor of the building. The reception area contains an 858-page book listing the names of Jews who did not survive the German occupation.

Within easy walking distance is Wertheim-Plantsoen Park, which is named after a 19th-century Jewish businessman and philanthropist. A memorial by sculptor Jan Wolkers, composed of seven large panes of broken glass, honours the victims of Auschwitz. Since tens of thousands of Dutch Jews were killed in Auschwitz, this simple yet powerful monument speaks volumes.

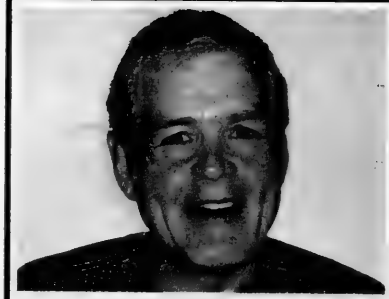
Across the street, at 58 Nieuwe Keizergracht, is an elegant cream-coloured building that housed the wartime Joodse Raad, or Nazi-appointed Jewish Council. It has since been converted into a hotel.

The Jewish Council, set up in the winter of 1941, was headed by Abraham Asscher, a diamond merchant, and David Cohen, a professor. Before the war, the diamond industry in the Netherlands was dominated by Jews. The Asscher Diamond Company, in the gentrified Pijp district, was at the top of the heap. Asscher's competitor, the Boas family, founded Gassan Diamonds, which was turned into a textile factory after the war and reopened as a diamond exchange in 1989.

Within earshot of the former Jewish Council building is a tree-lined street, Henri Polaklaan. It honours Henri Polak, who was instrumental in the founding of the Diamond Workers Union and the Social Democratic Workers Party. Arrested by the Germans in July 1940, he died about two years later.

A nearby street crossing a canal is named after Anne Frank, the famous Jewish diarist who died before she could be liberated. Drab and altogether characterless, this street, regrettably, fails to pay justice to such an iconic figure in Dutch history.

Romspen is the best financial decision I have ever made.



I am wary of investment tips. Most are a recipe for losing money. But investing with Romspen is absolutely the best investment decision I ever made. In fact, I have reinvested many times over the years.

Don't confuse Romspen with the scammers. Romspen is not too good to be true. It is a fund of first mortgages in Canada that is managed by experienced and fine people. It works because they know what they are doing. Their excellent reputation with both investors and borrowers is well deserved.

World still indifferent to Ahmadinejad: Cotler

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Stronger international sanctions and diplomatic repercussions against Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's Iran must be put in place to keep the Iranian leader's genocidal agenda in check, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler said recently.

This needs to be done in view of what he termed intolerable continued international "indifference" by the United Nations and the international community at large.

In Toronto to speak at Holy Blossom Temple, Cotler told an audience of about 200 that he had just put the finishing touches on an international petition that he plans to deliver to world leaders at the G20 and G8 summits next week.

His "Responsibility to Prevent Petition" of last December against Ahmadinejad's Iran now boasts more than 100 signatories, Cotler said. The Liberal party's special counsel on human rights and international justice said he recently met with UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon and exhorted him to do more to counter the Iranian threat.

"I advised him that the UN has a responsibility, under Article 99 of the charter, to bring this issue before the Security Council," Cotler said.

Cotler also met with Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon and advised him that Canada should make Iran a priority in their discussions.

Cotler restated the four main threats posed by Iran that are articulated in the petition: nuclear capability, state-sanctioned incitement to genocide, sponsorship of international terrorism and massive repression of the country's citizens.

All this constitutes a "toxic convergence" of threat, Cotler said. Iran today is "a genocide waiting to occur."

Irwin Cotler

Ahmadinejad has demonstrated nothing but "mocking defiance" of the international community, Cotler added.

Cotler's petition with a comprehensive list of measures the international community can take has been signed by jurists, politicians and human rights figures, including Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel, former UN human rights high commissioner Louise Arbour and Senator Roméo Dallaire, the former UN mission commander for Rwanda.

Asked about Ahmadinejad's recent trip to the United States, where he was interviewed on television and appeared at the United Nations, Cotler said it's all about the "culture of impunity" that surrounds a man bent on destroying Jews, Israel and even his own people.

"Here's a person who belongs in the docket of the accused, and yet he's received at the United Nations, he's given a podium at a conference against nuclear weapons," Cotler said. "You begin to think you're living in Alice in Wonderland in international terms."

Last week, Cotler rose in the House of Commons demanding that the government list the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) as a terrorist entity.

He called the IRGC a "leading international sponsor and perpetrator of global terrorism, responsible for the commission of more than 100 terrorist acts on every continent, while engaged in the massive domestic repression of its own people."

Cotler said the government has been "considering" listing the IRGC as a terrorist entity for three years and that the time had now come for it to act.

In response, Peter Kent, minister of state of foreign affairs for the Americas, said the government viewed the IRGC as "an ongoing concern" and that it would "continue to consider the possibility of such sanction."

Islam promotes culture of death, says Muslim writer

Ahmadinejad on a 'suicidal mission' to get nuclear weapons

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Islam promotes a culture of death rather than life itself, charges Ayaan Hirsi Ali, a fierce critic of Islam and a defender of women's rights in Islamic societies.

A 40-year-old Somali Muslim who renounced Islam and now considers herself an atheist, she levelled this accusation in a tough speech June 8 at the CBC's Glenn Gould Studio in downtown Toronto.

Here to deliver a lecture sponsored by the Donner Canadian Foundation, Ali recounted that she was raised with the belief that life on earth is brief and merely a test and that "eternal life" in heaven only begins after death.

"I was groomed into investing in the hereafter," she explained, later adding that Islam is fixated on "the other side," the period following death on earth.

While Islam isn't the sole religion brimming with notions about the hereafter, it's the only one that places so much emphasis on death, she argued.

Raised in Kenya, Ethiopia and Saudi Arabia after her family fled Somalia, Ali said she discovered a more life-affirming philosophy and an alternative to Islam after settling in the Netherlands.

There she was exposed to a here-and-now rather than a hereafter philosophy of life, she explained.

In the Netherlands, where she served as a member of parliament from 2003 to 2006, she learned that people do not submit to rigorous religious systems, such as in Islam, and are free to mould their own individualistic lives.

Ali transformed herself into an outspoken advocate of Muslim women's rights in her adopted homeland, which is home to almost one million Muslims.

Ayaan Hirsi Ali

In 2004, she and Dutch film director Theo van Gogh made Submission, a documentary about the oppression of women in conservative Islam countries.

After Submission was broadcast on Dutch television, a Dutch Muslim subscribing to Islamic radicalism murdered van Gogh and threatened to kill Ali, forcing her to go into hiding.

Ali generated headlines again when the government stripped her of her Dutch citizenship, claiming she had lied in an asylum application.

Ali immigrated to the United States, becoming a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute.

In 2007, her memoir, Infidel, was published. Last month, the Free Press published her second book, Nomad: From Islam to America.

In her appearance in Toronto, Ali charged that Saudi Arabia, through mosques and schools it finances abroad, has spread the message that eternal life commences only after death.

She said that Muslim immigrants in the West are the target of this message.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Iran's president, has embarked on a "suicidal mission" to acquire nuclear weapons because he yearns for eternal life and thus welcomes death, she asserted.

Lamenting that reformers within Islam are stifled and killed, Ali said they have few followers.

In other comments, Ali suggested that the Arab-Israeli conflict is a symbol of the West's conflict with Islam, and that both sides are engaged in a "clash of civilizations, a war of ideas."

A feminist, Ali urged women, Christians and humanists to compete with Islam for hearts and minds.

Voicing skepticism about U.S. President Barack Obama's outreach policy to the Muslim world, Ali caustically observed that he will achieve popularity once he accepts Israel's destruction, Iran's acquisition of an atomic arsenal and Arab despotism.

In lashing remarks on the western media, she said it is generally uncritical of Islam, refusing to use a term such as "Islamic terrorism," and treats Israel harshly.

Wading into yet another controversial topic, Ali said the notion of building a mosque at "ground zero," the Manhattan district where Arab terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001, is both "tasteless" and "insensitive."

Religious issues pervade 'all aspects of life' in Israel, says Middle East analyst

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Whether they recognize it or not, people in Israel who call themselves secular Jews are affected by religious issues, political scientist and Middle East analyst David Goldberg said last week.

Speaking June 8 at a continuing education program at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, Goldberg said that even secular Jews live by a Jewish calendar in Israel, and that religious divisions there are more complicated than the secular-vs.-haredi model that North Americans often refer to.

"Religious issues are intertwined into all aspects of life in Israel," he said, citing during the course of the evening politics, socio-cultural aspects, and the Israel Defence Forces – which, he noted, now has a modern Orthodox majority among its officers.

Goldberg's talk, titled "Redefining the Secular-Religious Divide in Israel," was the third in a series on Israel's domestic challenges. The former director of research and education for the Canada-Israel Committee, Goldberg founded a consulting group last year to deal with Middle East issues, and is Canadian Jewish Congress' project manager and educational consultant for the upcoming Nov. 11 commemoration in Halifax of the MS St. Louis, a German passenger ship that was turned away from Canada in 1939.

Goldberg said that the majority of Israeli Jews – some 55 per cent – define themselves as traditional in terms of religious practice. Only a small fraction – about 20 per cent – would say they are "militantly" secular, he added.

Haredim – the most religiously right-wing of the Orthodox sector – represent eight per cent of the Israeli Jewish population, but Goldberg anticipates an increase in the future, because of the population growth in that sector.

David Goldberg

Within the Orthodox population, there are internal divisions along Sephardi and Ashkenazi lines, reflected in their political parties, Goldberg noted.

Over the past 20 years, he said, Israel has seen a bump in the secular population with the influx of Russian Jews, but those immigrants have started to integrate into the rest of Israeli society.

Non-Orthodox synagogues are still, for the most part, perceived as an "external," Diaspora phenomenon, he added.

For Conservative and Reform Jewry to create "a true presence" in Israel, Goldberg said, "they have to stop thinking of themselves only as religious movements. They have to play down-and-dirty politics with the Orthodox community… That means creating a place for themselves in political parties."

Goldberg illustrated the reach of religion into politics when he recalled that "the cutting back of additional subsidies to large families nearly brought down the Sharon government," referring to a 2003 cutback threat that prompted haredi parties Degel HaTorah and Agudat Israel – functioning together under the banner of United Torah Judaism – to say they would pull out of the government.

The Orthodox Shas party, with 11 seats in the Knesset, could "easily bring down the government," Goldberg said.

Haredim in Israel have had an influence not because of their numbers, but because of bloc voting in a Knesset made up of many parties, he explained in a follow-up interview.

One of the main problems in Israel, according to Goldberg, is exemplified in recent developments concerning the current government's proposed conversion bill.

"It's taking what was a relatively understood, wink-and-nod system that had functioned for the past 60 years since Israel was established as a secular state but with the Orthodox in charge of religious affairs… and enacting it into law.

"That changes the [political] dynamic," he said.

"It won't destroy the state," he told The CJN, "but it will set back efforts by the Reform and Conservative movements to establish a presence for themselves in Israel."

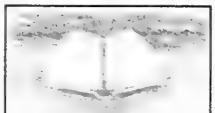
Jewish Life

The kashrut professional

By RABBI TSVI HEBER

Keeping kosher has never been as easy as it is today. Just take a stroll down the "kosher aisles" of many local supermarkets and you will observe a plethora of kosher products. All your basic food groups and more are readily available bearing kosher certification. Culinary experiences offered at an array of kosher restaurants and event venues have reached an unprecedented level of sophistication and taste.



Rabbinic Reflections

Some may remember a time when kosher food production simply referred to the local milkman who went down to the farm to supervise the milking of the cows, or to a woman who kashered her chickens by salting them in her kitchen.

Needless to say, much has changed since then. Ingredient complexities and highly sophisticated manufacturing techniques and machinery have redefined the meaning of kosher production. We live in an age when the addition of an emulsifier (often derived from cow or hog) in ice cream can render it non-kosher; and where 100 per cent vegetable oil may be produced on the same equipment as animal fat. Seemingly basic ingredients such as natural flavours and colours may be derived from insects, and artificial flavours from cats.

Indeed, the job of the kosher certifier has become all the more challenging.

At the helm of successful kosher supervision programs and unrelenting in their willingness to meet these challenges, are the mashgichim, literally, kosher supervisors. Briefly put, a mashgiach's job is to ensure that the food manufacturer is in compliance with the policies of the governing kosher certifying agency. Accomplishing this feat requires an array of technical, social and halachic skills.

As a rule, companies and food establishments can look forward to working with professionals who are knowledgeable in the areas of kosher law that pertain to their particular assignment, are eager to understand the company's operations, can explain kosher requirements and will work with the company to resolve issues. Although in many cases, mashgichim do not have rabbinic ordination, they do have training appropriate to the handling of their responsibilities and they seek rabbinic guidance when necessary. Often, the mashgiach will be referred to as "rabbi" as a recognition of this religious responsibility, irrespective of a formal degree of ordination.

Kashrut professionals who supervise industrial manufacturing facilities have multifaceted knowledge of food plants. They use their knowledge of food science and chemistry to determine potential pitfalls in the company's ingredients and formulae. In order to kasher non-kosher industrial equipment, they require a basic understanding of mechanical engineering.

The kashrut professional also has a strong understanding of the different manufacturing processes that are used by the plant to determine if there is any risk of cross-contamination between kosher and non-kosher. Good computer skills and knowledge of the kosher certifier's database are always prerequisite qualifications.

Kashrut professionals who supervise food service-type establishments also have basic knowledge of commercial equipment and processes. They are trained to understand aspects of entomology in order to understand insect infestations in food. They also have an understanding of basic aspects of financial reporting to identify any abnormalities in purchases and sales. Select mashgichim are trained to safely operate torches and hot water kettles for the purpose of kashering non-kosher equipment.

Whether young or old, novice or veteran, the New-Age mashgiach has evolved into a true kashrut professional.

Rabbi Tsvi Heber is the director of kashrut, foodservice division, Kashruth Council of Canada in Toronto.

Business ethics needs more attention

The field of Jewish business ethics is often a lonely one. When people discuss Jewish law, it's usually rituals such as Shabbat, kashrut or the Jewish holidays that they have in mind. One would be hard-pressed to find issues relating to corporations, the stock market, competition, taxation polices or advertising guidelines in the curriculum of most Jewish day schools and yeshivot, or in adult education courses at most synagogues.

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

While the reason for this neglect are many and varied – some may even have a modicum of validity – the impact isn't hard to discern. Somehow, otherwise observant Jews are much too often lax in this area of Jewish law. While stringencies have become part and parcel of modern Jewish life – at least amongst those committed to observance of Halachah – issues relating to money seem to be an excuse to search for leniencies.

While the meticulous observance of these laws isn't easy, other areas of Jewish law that also have many difficult challenges have met with much greater luck. Despite the difficulties involved in going to shul twice daily through thick and thin, those saying Kaddish seem to manage to overcome all obstacles in their desire to honour the memory of their parents. Ironically, while no observant Jew would think of violating Shabbat even if he were to miss out on a deal worth millions of dollars, that same person might decide not to declare some income on his tax return, violating the prohibition of stealing for a mere few dollars.

If there is one area where our spiritual energies should be focused, it's the realm of money, morality and the marketplace. The business world presents us with many ethical challenges and dilemmas, and all too often we don't rise to the challenge. Slowly but surely, business schools have started to understand this and have introduced mandatory courses in business ethics to try to sensitize us to the issues involved.

I sense that while most Jewishly engaged people can articulate the uniqueness of Jewish ritual, they'd be hard pressed to do so the same for a Jewish monetary code of ethics. While Jewish law demands that Jews follow the laws of the lands in which they reside, there's much more to Jewish business ethics than that. Areas such as limited liability, conflict of interest and the availability of credit are three of the many areas where the perspective of Jewish law differs from that of secular law.

Perusals of the daily newspapers present much material that deserves comment from a Jewish perspective. Often, these stories involve accusations against individuals or corporations. My intent is not to discuss the validity of such accusations, but to offer a Jewish perspective regarding those accusations. While their ultimate truth is crucial, for our purposes they serve as a springboard for discussion. My acceptance of "mere accusations" as the basis for an article might mistakenly lead a reader to believe that I accept such accusations as fact.

In my last article on the investigation into the trading practices of Goldman Sachs, I was critical of the practices that the firm was accused of without clearly noting that Goldman denies all allegations against it, and many prominent people who have an understanding of the often complex world of financial transactions have defended Goldman Sachs' trading practices. Yet by stating that the firm may have acted legally, if not morally, I was accused by others of being too easy on them.

It's difficult in a monthly column to deal with the necessary nuance that is part and parcel of all legal (and moral) systems, especially one that dates back close to 4,000 years. It's my hope that these columns will serve to generate further study.

Jewish Life

This Bible guide reaches out to all

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

For as long as there have been rabbis, they have written and preached with the goal of making the words of the Torah more meaningful to Jewish readers.

Of course this can be done in many ways. An ancient text can be more meaningful if you have a better understanding of the world from which it originated. As Moses Maimonides put it in his Guide of the Perplexed (3:50): "The chronicles of those times [biblical times] are hidden from us today. If we knew them and were cognizant of the events that happened in those days, we would know in detail the reasons of many things mentioned in the Torah." An interpretation that explains a text in its historical context is often referred to as pshat, the plain or contextual understanding of the Bible in its historical setting.

Martin Lockshin

But most rabbis want to show Jewish readers that the text is relevant to us today. That type of exposition – taking a 3,000-year-old text and showing how it can guide us with our own contemporary problems – is often referred to as midrash, which implies searching deeply into the text to find hints or allusions to events and problems of our times. Only in some few cases are interpretations relevant both to ancient readers with their set of problems and to us today.

Rabbi Shmuel Goldin, one of the leading Orthodox rabbis in the United States today, has just published the third volume in his inspirational series entitled Unlocking the Torah Text. Published this year (Gefen Publishing House and OU Press), this volume is about the third book of the Bible, Leviticus (Vayikra), a challenging book for any interpreter.

Rabbi Goldin teaches at Yeshiva University in New York. He has served as rabbi of a major Orthodox synagogue in Englewood, N.J., for 26 years (a tenure that is an accomplishment for any rabbi). He is active in the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), the leading group of modern or "centrist" Orthodox rabbis in North America. Currently, he is the first vice-president of the organization, meaning that, barring the unforeseen, he will be its next president. He is known as a moderate who has spoken out thoughtfully in favour of the peace process in Israel and has worked together with non-Orthodox rabbis on a number of issues (both gestures that are not standard in the American Orthodox rabbinate). Ten years ago, he delivered an often-quoted public talk at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America (the Conservative rabbinical school), entitled "Why Can't We All Just Get Along: An Orthodox Rabbi's View on Pluralism."

In this book, Rabbi Goldin demonstrates his skill as a reader of the Bible and his impressive command of the different layers of pre-modern Jewish Bible interpretation. He professes a deep love for pshat, the historical contextual interpretation, and shows that he is adept at that type of interpretation. For example, when commenting on the verse (Leviticus 10:9) in which God instructs Aaron the priest to refrain from drinking wine or any intoxicating beverage when serving in God's sanctuary, Rabbi Goldin notes that the use of alcohol as a stimulant for religious or "spiritual" activity was very common in the ancient world. He explains that the Torah wanted Jews to be different.

But like rabbis throughout the ages, most of Rabbi Goldin's explanations would be classified, in my assessment, as midrash, attempts to make the text of the Bible relevant to people alive today and the problems that they encounter. Understandably, the kinds of issues that Rabbi Goldin identifies in the text generally relate to the lives of his congregants or of other observant Jews. When discussing verses in Leviticus that deal with the difference between intentional and accidental behaviour, he gives the example (which speaks to any observant Jew) of walking into a room on the Sabbath and automatically flipping on the light switch without thinking about what you are doing.

He also provides a learned discussion of how rabbinic tradition expands the ethical statement (Leviticus 19:14) "Do not place a stumbling block before the blind," to include any case where someone's action might lead to another person misbehaving. The examples that he provides are from common Orthodox conundrums: if I am a kosher caterer, may I cater a function where I know that Jewish law will be broken in various ways, or am I putting a stumbling block before the guests by providing the kosher food and the kosher imprimatur? May I invite a non-Orthodox Jew to my home for a Sabbath meal if I know that he/she is likely to drive to get there?

(I was actually surprised that, when discussing the verse mentioned above, against using alcohol in the service of God, the book passed up the opportunity of making the ancient text relevant to modern observant Jews by speaking out against the troubling phenomenon of private "kiddush clubs" that meet in an anteroom in the middle of the prayer service in so many synagogues, or the phenomenon of competition between synagogues to attract members by providing the fanciest brands of scotch at the public kiddush.)

Many modern Orthodox rabbis, myself included, struggle with the question of the appropriate use of language when speaking and writing in English about Jewish topics. Some circles of Orthodox Jews feel that the use of standard English – including terms that Christian clergy might use – when describing Jewish holy things is inappropriate. For example, recently I was at an Orthodox synagogue where a visiting rabbi made reference in a public talk to "the Temple in Jerusalem." He was told, politely but in no uncertain terms, that language like that was not appreciated in that synagogue. He should have said "the beis ha-mikdash."

Rabbi Goldin generally avoids the use of untranslated Hebrew, Aramaic and Yiddish terms in this series of books, but does not quite reach the level of universal linguistic accessibility achieved by other modern Orthodox rabbis, such as Rabbi Jonathan Sacks of England. For biblical names, Rabbi Goldin attempts to replicate the Hebrew pronunciation in English letters, but only someone who knows Hebrew is likely to realize that "Yeravam" is the name of the king generally known to English readers as Jeroboam. Many Hebrew words such as kehunah (meaning priesthood) are used, when, to my mind, the English word would have been fine. Such words are explained the first time they appear, but without a glossary in the book, it's hard to imagine that a reader encountering the word kehunah 20 or 30 pages later would be able to handle the book's language without previous Hebrew knowledge.

The frequent use of Hebrew terms in an English book about Torah is understandable. It can help create a community, a group of Jews who share a language in addition to sharing values. But there is a down side, too, as it also excludes others (i.e. other Jews) while it builds up the "in" group.

Rabbi Goldin is well aware of the insider/outsider problem of modern Orthodoxy. In the last pages of this book he writes movingly: "A growing sense of triumphant insularity, particularly in the Orthodox community, prevents any meaningful sharing with those 'outside.' Unaffiliated Jews feel less and less connected to thriving Jewish communities in their backyards, while the communities themselves do little to change that. I have often wondered how 'successful' modern Orthodox congregations, such as my own, will one day be judged. Will the credit we receive for our own internal accomplishments be offset by our lack of involvement with the disappearing Jewish community beyond our walls?"

Perhaps there is reason for some hope that the RCA under the leadership of someone as sensitive as Rabbi Goldin will find a way to become more open and inclusive, and to speak the language of all North American Jews.

Martin Lockshin is a humanities professor at York University and also a member of the RCA.

Birthright alumni fashion show supports seniors

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

The Birthright Israel Alumni Community (BAC) held its second BAC2FASHION event, a runway and dance show, on June 3 at Six Degrees.

Hundreds of Birthright Israel alumni, family members and friends gathered at the nightclub to support the charity event which raised $33,000 for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's seniors initiatives.

"Seniors comprise one of the largest vulnerable groups in the community," said Melissa Lass, a co-chair of BAC-2FASHION. Noah Zatzman, Ehren Gluckstein, Jessica Taylor and Jen Weisz, all past Birthright Israel alumni or trip leaders, were fellow chairs.

"Many of us have been privileged to share wonderful relationships with our grandparents. They are our teachers, our role models and our heroes. We feel deeply connected to our cause and look forward to giving back to a generation who has given so much to us," Lass said.

Today, many seniors live alone and lack connections to or awareness of social, recreational, educational and wellness support. BAC2FASHION aims to enhance this support through UJA initiatives that provide portals for isolated seniors to access vital services and programming, as well as increase assistance for the poverty stricken.

This year's theme, the Remix, displayed how modern fashion, music and dance have been influenced by previous generations. "With the idea that everything old is new, and that trends come back, we wanted to honour our grandparents and loved ones through the show. That is why much of the music was modern remixes from classic songs," said Zatzman.

BAC2FASHION was born from a vision to showcase talent and encourage young people to make a positive impact on society, Zatzman said. "We wanted to pay tribute to 'the greatest generation' and so that became the show's cause and a theme that was woven through the visuals and dance."

Zatzman said it's essential that younger Jewish community members come together to help the older generation. "As the baby boomers begin to retire, we all have to be aware of our responsibilities to them. They took care of us, and now the time has come for us to take care of them."

One of the evening's highlights was a series of video clips interspersed throughout the show of Birthright participants and their grandparents reflecting on their memories and relationships. "I think they really touched everyone and brought the theme and cause full circle," Zatzman said.

Lionel Robins, chair of the UJA Seniors Task Force, congratulated the Birthright Israel Alumni Community on their efforts to combine "the passion for fashion with the passion for giving back to the Jewish community." He said he looks forward to working with the leaders and participants of the show "to put the funds they have raised to use through engaging marginalized and socially isolated seniors."

The show featured fashion from boutiques such as American Apparel, Over the Rainbow, Sense of Independence, Boa and Quagmire Golf. It also highlighted collections from up-and-coming Canadian designers, including Jay Godfrey and Erin Kleinberg, whose lines are gaining traction in the New York fashion scene.

With an eco-friendly twist and hand-sewn beading and embellishments, Kleinberg provides the ultimate in luxury while maintaining comfort in her line. Recognizing her design esthetic from the start, Barneys New York picked up her first collection and has since been a strong supporter of her brand.

Godfrey's collection targets the fashion-forward and glamorous woman and has been featured in Elle, Cosmopolitan and the New York Post. His designs have also attracted a celebrity following, including Eva Longoria Parker, Jennifer Lopez, Eva Mendes and Petra Nemcova.

"The evening was an incredible success," said Weisz, who founded BAC2FASHION in 2008 with Jordan Morra and was the show's model choreographer. "We had a packed house, great feedback to the raffle prizes and every person in the audience loved the event."

The Star's flotilla piece was crass propaganda

That Israel walked into a trap on May 30 in its effort to prevent the Mavi Marmara from running its blockade of Gaza is not in dispute, and it's a valid subject of criticism.

But what is also beyond dispute is that much of the worldwide reaction to this event (partly described in last week's column) can only be described as a fit bordering on hysteria. The next time many in the media rush to condemn Israel for its "disproportionate" reaction (a term never applied to U.S.-NATO operations in Afghanistan and former U.S.-British operations in Iraq, where large numbers of civilians have been killed), they should stop to consider whether the extent of the criticism is itself proportionate to Israel's actions. While some of it was, too much of it was off the deep end.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Consider this: by one measure – the total number of items tallied by Google News on a given story – worldwide media paid as much, if not more, attention to the Gaza flotilla saga (of important but limited international significance) as they did to the election of Barack Obama as the first black U.S. president.

As befits Power's extreme polemic, there's no mention at all of Hamas' racist, anti-Semitic covenant and its violent rejection of Jewish sovereignty. He's silent on the launching of more than 10,000 rockets and mortars into Israel since 2005, when Israel withdrew unilaterally from Gaza. No mention is made of the long history of Israeli compromise leading to peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan, and even territorial compromise with the Palestinians under the Oslo process – stopped only by the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's own violent rejection of the Israeli-U.S. offer for Palestinian statehood in 2000. In short, there's no mention of any salient fact that could possibly weigh against Power's determination to demonize Israel.

Power's article is so twisted with distortion and deceit that it's hard to understand how such a screed could end up in a respectable Canadian paper, let alone this country's largest daily.

Yet, absurdly, the Star has defended printing this piece on the grounds that it's fair-minded "analysis," even though there's not a shred of what constitutes real analysis in it. Power's article has been described by a prominent and very moderate Israeli academic (in a private exchange) as "ignorant bigotry."

Irate Israelis last week demonstrated their disdain of the Turkish government's condemnation of Israel's actions regarding the "Freedom Flotilla." [Israel Sun]

When one surveys what else Power has written about Israel, that description seems apt. For instance, in a piece headlined "Looking at the end of Israel?" (Jordan Times, May 2, 2008), Power argued that the Balfour Declaration, which promised the Jews a homeland in Palestine, was a historical injustice inflicted on the Arabs.

He wrote something that's eerily reminiscent of former White House correspondent Helen Thomas's recent bigoted attack on Israel: "The Jews would not be driven into the sea. But those who wanted to return to Europe, America or even Russia would be more than welcome. Both Germany and Russia, the great centres of anti-Semitism in the past, have seemed to have flushed that horror away." The last line, meant as cover for the previous one, will fool no one. For Power, apparently, the real "horror" is the Jews' presence in the Jewish state.

Why the Star felt it justified to turn to someone like Power, and why it considers the June 2 piece to be analytical, are important questions that require answers.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Speaking of being off the deep end, as of late last week, the Toronto Star had run six columns and op-eds on the subject reflecting one point of view – harsh criticism of Israel. One in particular by Jonathan Power, a British writer with a well-earned reputation for Israel-bashing, published on June 2, opened as follows: "The unprovoked and murderous Israeli commando attack on the peace flotilla is the Selma of the Arab-Jewish struggle for the land of Palestine."

Power's piece is crass propaganda. He casts the Palestinians in the role of U.S. blacks during the days of the civil rights struggle under the non-violent leadership of Martin Luther King Jr. He depicts the Israelis as brutal oppressors who "seized 80 per cent of the land that early in the 20th century belonged lock, stock and barrel to the Arabs." Power insists that having usurped the land, Israelis refuse to compromise over the remaining 20 per cent.

A-G urged to prosecute Hossain

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Police have concluded their investigation into former York University student Salman Hossain and turned over the file to Ontario Attorney General Chris Bentley to determine whether criminal charges should be laid.

Hossain, who is rumoured to have left Canada, has been linked to the website "filthyjewishterrorists.com," that calls for the murder of all Jews and blames Jews for wars and other catastrophes.

Under Canada's Criminal Code provisions against advocating genocide or promoting hate, prosecutions can proceed only with the consent of the attorney general.

Hossain's alleged postings to the website created a public outcry last winter, prompting York to announce it was suspending him.

Earlier, Bentley declined to sanction charges against Hossain, saying he appeared to be rehabilitated. However, a lead item on the website last week was titled, "The Destruction of the West is the Only Way to Exterminate the Jews!"

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said "I believe this is exactly what the law was written for."

He said that assuming police were able to link Hossain to the site and prove he authored the content, "I would think it's the kind of case sections [against advocating genocide and promoting hate] were written for. It would be unbelievable if charges weren't laid."

Edelstein urges 'speak up, be active'

Asked whether he believes the constant vilification of Israel is affecting young people's attachment to the Jewish state, Edelstein said, "There's a legitimate concern that young Jews do not want to be associated with Israel."

He told the story of an e-mail that an event organizer showed him during an earlier trip to the United States. The e-mail came "from an affiliated Jew and it said, 'Why do you invite these Israeli speakers in the first place? I feel about Israel what I feel about India.'"

The younger generation may not have the same emotional attachment to Israel that was common among earlier generations, Edelstein said. "We have to work hard to find a common denominator. Birthright [which provides a free trip to Israel] is a wonderful program that changes attitudes."

When speaking to young Jews, "I try not to talk about the conflict, but show a broader picture, things that young people can be proud of, and we have plenty. I hope when things become calmer, we'll be able to talk more about high-tech, culture and sports," Edelstein said.

In reference to the criticism Israel suffered after the flotilla incident, in which nine people died when the Israel Defence Forces intercepted six ships attempting to break the naval blockade of the Gaza Strip, Edelstein acknowledged that Israel is often too slow off the mark to respond to the accusations of its opponents. Israel had video evidence demonstrating that the passengers on the Turkish cargo ship were armed thugs ready to do battle with Israeli marines, not the peace activists and humanitarians their supporters claimed.

The video was released hours after Israel's detractors went into full attack mode, because, unlike its foes, Israel is a democratic state ruled by law that must carefully vet its public pronouncements, Edelstein said.

The videos, which showed "peace activists" clubbing Israeli soldiers with rods and throwing one from one deck to another, had to first be approved for release by the army chief of staff and then Israeli legal advisers, he said.

It took 10 to 12 hours for the videos to be released, and in that time, Israel came under heavy criticism.

Israelis last week demonstrated their support for their government's actions in the "Flotilla incident" [Flash90 photo]

"We are not organized well enough and there are things we can improve," Edelstein said. "But we are a responsible nation. We need to check the facts before releasing them. Palestinian supporters, they have no problem lying and saying things you can't believe – that soldiers shot while in the air [in helicopters]."

Edelstein believes that in his media appearances, he has been able to show that the situation wasn't black and white, as pro-Palestinians described it.

"I try to present a true picture of what happened – the reason for the blockade, to protect the lives of civilians on both sides – since the more access Hamas has to weapons, the less stable the situation, more attacks and reprisals."

Edelstein said Canadian Jews should "speak up, be active" and not cede ground to Israel's foes.

Groups to march alongside Kulanu

It describes itself as a "coalition of queer Torontonians that support diversity of political opinion in Pride Toronto activities."

Flanders said she is a member of the coalition.

"There are those who argue that Pride is not political, that it should not be political, that it is merely a party, a celebration of our hard-won rights… my Pride is political," she wrote. "All those invited this year to speak to the human rights agenda have cancelled coming to Toronto Pride this year in opposition to [Pride's] decision to ban QuAIA. They understand that freedom of speech is the basic tenet for equal rights and democracy. They do not see criticizing Israel for its action as hate speech, but rather about exercising one's right to criticize state policies."

Justine Apple, executive director of Kulanu Toronto, a group representing many Jewish gay Torontonians, said she has received confirmation from many local community organizations – including Canadian Jewish Congress, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, congregation Darchei Noam and Hillel of Greater Toronto – of their intention to march alongside Kulanu in this year's parade.

Apple said she expects up to 300 people to march with Kulanu at the parade in support of Israel, which would make it the biggest contingent the organization has had at the event.

Toronto-Pride week begins June 25 and culminates in the July 4 Pride Parade.

Project keeps Holocaust survivors' stories alive

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

None of Bailey Horenfeldt's grandparents are Holocaust survivors. That fact helped spur the young Toronto photographer to her evocative senior class project.

"How my grandparents lived and how Holocaust survivors lived… they were two totally different lives," says the 21-year-old graduate of Ryerson University's four-year image arts program. "It's the real and the surreal. I think that is part of the reason I am so interested in the subject."

Drawn by the stark contrast of her own familial exposure to the Holocaust – or lack of it – and that of some of her contemporaries, Horenfeldt chose to photograph local Holocaust survivors as her major thesis project. The results do not sound the customary themes of haunting or darkness, but of light and even optimism. All the subjects are photographed in their homes, surrounded by family pictures and albums of their children and grandchildren.

The collection, according to Horenfeldt, shows the courage and resiliency of these Jewish survivors and their devotion to recreate what the Nazis stole from them: family.

"To me, family is the most important thing in the lives of these survivors, and they are the ones who will keep the survivors' stories living," Horenfeldt says. "The significance of the photo frames and albums of the families in the photograph is to represent that the survivors survived, and these are the people who will make sure that their stories will be told and remembered forever.

"Their Jewish names will continue. That to me is huge."

Titled Family Generations, the series currently consists of seven 20-inch by 20-inch black-and-white photos depicting 10 survivors and indirectly, many of their progeny. Horenfeldt hopes to expand the total with the 30 or so more names she still has on her list of survivors.

She was inspired by a visit last summer to Israel's Yad Vashem memorial and museum.

"It came to my attention that in the next 10 to 20 years, there will not be any remaining survivors, and it is very important to me that these peoples' unbelievable and tragic stories live on forever," she says.

Though a child of the digital age, Horenfeldt chose to use film to convey an added authenticity.

"I thought it was more appropriate for this period in history."

She found her subjects through word of mouth and by attending Holocaust Education Week programs and the Dinner of Miracles, an annual affair that fosters dialogue between Holocaust survivors and the third generation.

Some of her subjects are familiar to Toronto residents: Faye Schulman, the one-time Polish partisan and herself a renowned wartime photographer who forms the project's central focus; Peter Silverman, who fought with the anti-Nazi resistance, his wife, Claire, and a galaxy of framed family pictures; Charles and Regina Goldfinger, Polish survivors whose tale is harrowing.

Horenfeldt formed a "strong bond" with those she photographed, she says.

"I loved listening to their stories."

The pictures were well received by her professors, she says (she's not sure but thinks she got an "A" on the project).

Three of the portraits were shown in April at the Gladstone Hotel's art gallery as part of the school of the image arts program's annual graduation exhibit, Maximum Exposure.

Horenfeldt says that as a young Jewish woman from Canada, "it's important to me to educate people on the Holocaust and document as many people's stories and testimonies before it is too late."

The portraits and survivors' stories are at baileyhorenfeldt.com, Horenfeldt's website.

Peter and Claire Silverman were photographed as part of a photography project about Holocaust survivors.

Canadian student hopes to connect to roots — in India

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Hayley Gold wants to get involved in Toronto's Jewish community. Which is why she's going to India.

The Toronto resident will be one of five students to participate in Hillel Toronto's "Travel with Purpose" trip to India.

Hayley Gold

Participants on the trip, which is in its second year and runs from July 7 to Aug. 12, will spend a week in Israel and then go to Dharmsala, India, 12 hours north of Delhi, where they'll volunteer with a variety of organizations that work with the local Tibetan refugee population.

"My best friend went on it last year. She told me about it. I was extremely jealous when she was going, I saw how it changed [her]," Gold said. "I think experiencing another culture allows you to look at yourself and your own culture and reflect on it."

Gold, a McGill University graduate who will be studying food and nutrition at Ryerson University in September, hopes the trip will help her connect to her community and heritage, something she's found difficult in the past.

"Growing up in a Jewish neighbourhood, I didn't really find my Jewish identity until I studied in Israel for a year," she said, noting that, three years ago, she attended Hebrew University in Jerusalem. "It's about the actual people. It's the way you interact with people more than going to the synagogue."

After her time in Israel, Gold tried to get involved in her local Jewish community, but it wasn't quite the same.

"I made so many close friends [in Israel], it made me want to become more involved in my Jewish community... I tried when I went back to Montreal [for school], but it didn't feel the same," she said.

Laura Herman, the trip leader, is hoping to change that.

"One of the unique opportunities we present is to not have this trip be an isolated experience. We want to encourage people to use their skills when they come back to campus," Herman said. "Our goal is that they use this as a jumping-off point to advocate for certain things that speak to them or become active in Jewish life."

In order to accomplish this, organizers have enhanced the trip's educational components, which will touch on international development issues and the importance of volunteerism. Students will volunteer both in Israel with local organizations and in Dharmsala, where they'll be able to choose which charities and sectors to work in.

"They'll focus on different community issues... [like] women's rights, helping children in the community, working with the elderly," Herman said, adding that some will teach English. "We'll all be living together and learning together... but all the volunteers will be matched with different organizations."

Herman hopes that this first-hand experience will help participants understand the importance of tikkun olam.

"There are many communities that need our assistance... we are obligated on a Jewish level to assist everyone," she said.

The trip leader also hopes that the Canadians and Israelis will connect.

"That's one of the focuses of the program. We want them to have these encounters with Israelis so it's not just an isolated experience. There's a lot we can learn from Israelis," she said.

Gold agrees.

"I'm really excited about that. I think Israelis are amazing people. They're... living in our Jewish nation and they fight in the army for it," she said. "I think we have so much to learn from them."

To participate on the trip, students must be heading back to school in the fall, and all must be interviewed and vetted by Herman.

"I'm just looking... to understand why people are motivated to go on the program. This is not going to be a sitting on the beach kind of thing. It's not a vacation. We're going to work," she said.

Class Acts

BNOT MITZVAH: As part of their bat mitzvah program at school, girls in Grade 6 at Netivot HaTorah Day School designed a toy for children at Zareinu Educational Centre that addressed specific learning issues facing children with special needs. The Design- A-Toy activity was a part of a school involvement project from the Zareinu Moveathon and was on display at the event. Pictured, from left, are Atara, Orly, Hadas and Meirav.

CHICKS AT SCHOOL: Junior kindergarten students and teachers at Bialik Hebrew Day School recently welcomed baby chicks to their classroom after nurturing their eggs for a month. All of Bialik's junior and senior kindergarten students enjoyed visiting daily to watch the eggs move, crack, and hatch as part of the JK spring farm animal study.

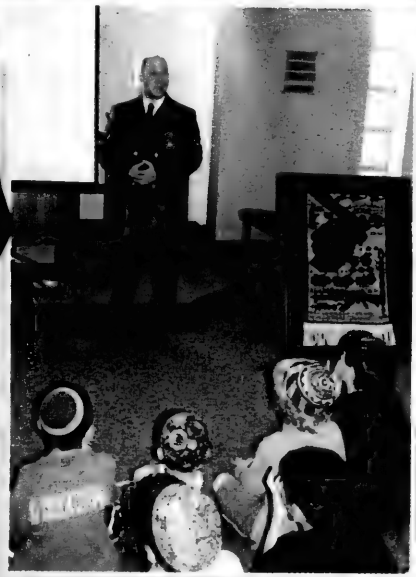
CHARITABLE TUG-OF-WAR: Students in junior kindergarten to Grade 6 – including Sarah Leigh, left, and Spencer Ochsberg – at Robbins Hebrew Academy's (formerly United Synagogue Day School) Beth Tzedec campus took part in a Ronald McDonald House field day that incorporated elements of tikkun olam and exercise. In the weeks leading up to the event, students collected donations for their self-selected charity for the 2009-10 school year, the Ronald McDonald House.



SOLDIER SPEAKS: Grade 2 students at Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin branch in Thornhil got a special visit recently from Master Seaman Michael Boyes to share pictures, artifacts and experiences related to being a Canadian soldier in Afghanistan.

Ottawa deli closes after 50 years

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — An Ottawa landmark, Nate's delicatessen served its last smoked meat sandwich on the date of its 50th anniversary last month.

According to owner Dave Smith, "It was time to hang up my apron."

The decision to close was made some time ago. "We sold the building two years ago and leased it back for two years, so I was able to prepare myself," Smith said.

The decision to open the deli was more spontaneous. One day back in 1959, Smith, then 26, and his sister, Freda, drove by a house for rent on Rideau Street and decided to take the plunge. They were joined by two other siblings, Jack and Nathan (for whom the deli was named) and the rest, as they say, is history.

Ottawa 50 years ago was no culinary mecca, and multiculturism had not yet arrived in the restaurants of the nation's capital. Nate's offered what was considered exotic fare at the time – smoked meat, knishes, blintzes and other assorted ethnic delicacies. There was really no competition – for anyone looking for a deli experience in Ottawa, Nate's was the place to go.

Musicians, artists and performers from more cosmopolitan cities found their way to Nate's, as evidenced by the walls filled with photos of the rich and famous. The food was good, the service loud and friendly, and the atmosphere boisterous.

Nate's offerings once considered exotic food

Longtime staff knew longtime customers and Nate's became, for many, a home away from home.

"Fifty years of cutting meat" will be a hard habit to break, Smith said.

He's already talking about the possibility of opening another, perhaps smaller deli after a bit of a break, but in the meantime, he plans to spend his time on his philanthropy.

"Yes, there was a tear in my eye on the last morning, but I want to spend more time doing my charity work. I want to do the stuff that really changes people's lives."

A well-known auctioneer at charity auctions around town, Smith said he does between 50 to 55 a year for various causes.

"I love it! I get such a high from it," he said. Over the years, he has helped to raise many millions of dollars, one of his proudest achievements.

One of Smith's projects is a residential treatment centre for youths dealing with substance abuse, which opened in 1993 and was the first of its kind in the Ottawa area.

After touring Africa, he came home determined to help, and ended up sending 37 containers of medical supplies there.

When he sees a need, he is determined to fill it, and he has big plans to help rebuild Haiti after last year's earthquake. He intends to "teach the kids to build houses" and establish a working farm and a fish farm which will be modelled after a kibbutz, with "everyone working."

He may not be cutting smoked meat, but Smith's hands won't be idle.

Calgary family celebrates 100 years in Canada

By IRENA KARSHENBAUM
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — An early childhood memory after my family immigrated in 1979 to Calgary from Kharkov, Ukraine (then in the former Soviet Union), is of a little old lady and her husband coming over to our government-subsidized apartment.

My parents were amused by this feisty lady, always "Mrs. Switzer," who had a very tall husband, Mendle. They also had four large sons (Israel, Albert and twins Henry and Jack). I can still see old Mendle reaching over to give me a quarter after I found the afikoman at a seder in 1980.

When I grew up, I learned that the Switzers were members of a large, extended family that has touched the lives of many.

The patriarch, Wolf Baer Scwajcer (1847-1924) circa 1920. [Photo courtesy the Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta]

The seeds of this family were planted in Poland with the birth of Wolf Baer Scwajcer in 1847. He had nine children – Mendel, Mindell, Faiga, Rifka, Sarah, Jacob, Jessie, Bella and Myer – with his first wife, Chaya Leeba, who died in 1884. He then remarried and had two children – Noma and Gershon – with Miriam Rzeczynski who outlived him by six years. She died in 1930.

The same fate would have befallen the Switzers that befell most other Jews who remained in Poland during World War II. But they understood that the escalating anti-Semitism would not end well, and Wolf Baer's daughter, Bella Singer, and her husband, Abraham, left Poland in 1907.

For a couple of years, they struggled as pedlars in Toronto, and then defeated, returned to Poland. But Bella saw the hopelessness in Poland and convinced her husband to return to Canada, this time settling in booming Calgary in the summer of 1910. This final move triggered a chain migration.

Bella and Abraham Singer began cleaning rooming houses. They had four children – Hymie, Diane, Jack and Rosalie – and still managed to save enough money to bring over the first of their relatives, 14-year-old Charlie Switzer.

Myer's granddaughter, Darlene Switzer-Foster, explains: "Every family member Bella would bring over would pay her back and she would use the money to bring over the next person. Every person would then start to save money to bring over their immediate family."

Using this system, Bella Singer is credited with having brought 300 family members to Canada.

Those early years were filled with hard work. Mostly illiterate, Mendle Switzer, Jacob's son, was a pedlar, then a cattle dealer, and eventually he and his wife, Rifka (our "Mrs. Switzer"), sold kosher chickens.

At age five, Sam Switzer, Myer's son, began contributing to his family's income by selling ice he scavenged from under the trains at the CPR tracks.

By the early 1930s, the Canadian government had adopted a policy that virtually banned immigration of Jews.

R.B. Bennett who had spoken at the ceremony for the laying of the cornerstone of the original House of Jacob in Calgary in 1911, was prime minister from 1930 to 1935 and Opposition leader from 1935 to 1938, but he refused to help the Jewish community.

Only a handful of those who were left in Poland after 1930 survived.

In 1942, Abraham died. Bella lived 42 years more and died at 103. After World War II, she was finally able to bring over her great-nephew, Sucher Cyngiser, Faiga's grandson.

Bella's youngest son, Jack, went on to buy Hollywood Center Studios, and his name graces Calgary's Jack Singer Concert Hall. The little boy who once sold ice, Sam Switzer, went on to build the Elbow River Casino. Jack Switzer has almost single-handedly written the Jewish history of southern Alberta. Edmontonian Daryl Katz (great-grandson of Jessie), assembled a network of pharmacies making him one of the richest people in Canada. He recently bought the Edmonton Oilers.

Today, the Switzer family includes names like Aizenman, Barron, Belzberg, Bronfman, Cohen, Fishman, Groner, Hector, Mendelman, Zysblat and others. At more than 1,700 members, it is believed to be the largest family in Canada.

The family website lists "City Liaisons" in Calgary, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Edmonton, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Los Angeles, the United Kingdom and Israel.

Switzer family reunions began in 1990. The next reunion will be held in Calgary on Sunday, July 4. If you are a Switzer, you can register at www.switzer.ca.

West Bank village's suit to be reviewed

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Quebec Court of Appeal has taken under advisement the case of a West Bank Palestinian village that wants to sue two Quebec-registered companies building homes for Israeli settlers on lands claimed by the village.

On June 3, the province's highest court accepted a petition to review the file submitted by Toronto lawyer Mark Arnold on behalf of the municipal council of Bil'in and 11 of its residents, and will decide whether it will hear the case.

Last September, Quebec Superior Court Justice Louis-Paul Cullen decided the case would not be heard in Quebec, upholding the two companies' motion asking that the court exempt itself from the case.

The civil suit was brought against Green Park International Inc. and Green Mount International Inc., and their sole director, a resident of Quebec.

The appeal alleges that Superior Court made grievous legal and factual errors in declining jurisdiction. Arnold argues that the villagers have to turn to Quebec courts for justice because Israeli courts have consistently ruled that the legality of the Jewish settlements is a political matter that they will not hear.

The lawsuit alleges the construction of homes for Israeli citizens violates Article 49(6) of the Fourth Geneva Convention, which prohibits an occupying power from transferring its own population into the territory occupied. The lands in question was lost to the Palestinians in the 1967 Six Day War and more recently with the erection of Israel's security barrier.

That provision of the Geneva conventions is recognized under Canadian law, but has not been incorporated into Israeli law, the litigants claim.

The litigants want the court to declare that the construction is illegal under international law, issue an injunction to halt the construction and demolish the existing approximately 30 condominium and apartment buildings, and $2 million in punitive damages.

In a 67-page ruling, Cullen found that the High Court of Justice, Israel's supreme court, is "clearly the logical forum and the authority in a better position" to decide this dispute.

Courts will allow multiple religions

Question: I have been separated from my ex-wife for over five years and have custody and primary residency of our son, age six, since he was two years old. Neither myself nor my ex-wife are religious but my ex-wife does celebrate some of the Jewish cultural activities. She claims that our son is Jewish and demands that he miss school on days that are Jewish Holidays, Does she have the right?

Answer: Yes, if she truly practices Judaism. Canadian law technically gives you the sole right to decide the child's religious upbringing since you are the custodial parent. However, it curiously also gives the access parent — in this case the mother — freedom to enjoy her religious traditions and to introduce her religion to the child on her time with him, even if it appears to contradict your religion.

Normally, these seemingly inconsistent rules are interpreted to mean that the mother can take the child (in this case your son) to synagogue and introduce him or her to Judaism and you can give him your take on religion in any way you want when he is with you. The reason is that Canada is a multicultural country and the courts show great deference to this tradition ensconced in Canada's constitution, particularly Article 27.

Canadian children are not, in fact, confused by their parents' differing religious positions if the parents are tolerant of each other and don't allow their differences to upset the children. The Courts enforce this principle by allowing the access parent maximum freedom when it comes to religious instruction, subject only to the rare situation where a child could be in some physical danger, such as Jehovah's Witness cases where a parent refuses to allow blood transfusions for a seriously ill child.

In your case I suspect that a Court would likely give your wife extra access to you child on her religious holidays, which by definition means that she could remove the child from school on those days. However, if she simply demanded that the child stay home from school without spending time with him on those same religious days, then she may well have a problem.

In most cases, if the parties are separated, one parent cannot unilaterally enforce his/her religious practises on the other parent when the children are in the other parent's care. The exception to this line of judicial reasoning occurs when a child has been raised as a faith-based observant Jew and that parent has been reasonably consistent in observing the Torah and its mitzvot, such as keeping Shabbat Holy (shomrai Shabbat), keeping kosher (not "kosher style"), and sending their children to Jewish day schools. Canadian Judges have made exceptions for a faith-based Orthodox child whose normal lifestyle would be otherwise disrupted by a parent seeking to impose something foreign, such as driving on the Sabbath by the other parent. Former White House aide backs Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer accused countries critical of Israel's "legitimate and legal blockade" of Gaza of hypocrisy, at a Jewish National Fund Negev dinner, held June 7 at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

Israel has the right to defend itself against the possibility of its enemies delivering weapons to Hamas-led Gaza, said Fleischer, who was the primary spokesperson for U.S. president George W. Bush from 2001 to 2003.

Ari Fleischer

"Israel has shown more restraint than any other nation would," said Fleischer, who now has his own communications company, "yet the world always blames Israel for what is wrong in the Middle East."

He contended that the leaders of sixth boat in the May 31 flotilla, where the nine deaths occurred, were determined to breach the blockade through aggression.

No other country, he said, would have endured rocket attacks on its civilians for years before taking action. "What would Turkey have done if rockets from the Kurds had landed daily?"

Even Egypt, he noted, has a blockade against Gaza, because it views Hamas as a "terrorist threat, and that tells you something."

Fleischer also said that Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is "a weak man" and that even "punishing" sanctions against Iran won't halt its march toward the development of nuclear weapons.

"The basic problem in the Middle East is that Israel does not have a reliable partner to negotiate with," he said. Abbas cannot clean up the corruption in his Fatah party or contain the civil strife in the Palestinian Authority, let alone undertake a peace agreement with Israel, according to Fleischer.

Under his watch, Gaza since the Israeli withdrawal in 2005 has become "the new Mogadishu" rather than a prosperous, moderate Arab polity such as Dubai.

"The fact is Israeli has proven it is ready and willing to make peace with its neighbours. The question is not what Israel will do for peace, but what the Arab world will do." What is needed, Fleischer thinks, is a Palestinian leader with the strength of an Anwar Sadat of Egypt or King Hussein of Jordan.

Israel's biggest worry today, however, is Iran, he continued. "Iran is getting closer to developing nuclear weapons every day," he said, despite six years of negotiations through international channels.

Fleischer indicated that Israeli or U.S. military action is the only option to stop Iran's nuclear program, but he said the Obama administration would never take that route.

He acknowledged that a strike by Israel would bring on a new round of missile attacks by Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas is Gaza, and perhaps other fighting.

Fleischer made only oblique reference to former "dean of the White House press corps" Helen Thomas' recent remarks about Jews and Israel, which led to her retirement last week.

Fleischer related that his mother was born in Hungary and immigrated to the United States in 1939 to escape anti-Semitism.

"When I hear people say Jews should go home, I think 'All we yearned for is a place we could call home.'"

He underlined that whether Jews are liberal, like his parents, or conservative like he is, they "stand together" on Israel.

Fleischer, who grew up in New York, said he was a liberal Democrat when he entered Middlebury College in Vermont in 1978, but emerged four years later as a Republican, "thanks to Jimmy Carter."

Fleischer spent a total of 21 years in Washington. Before becoming White House press secretary, he was a press aide for three Republican congressmen and one senator, and then worked on Bush's presidential campaign in 1999.

He was the voice of the administration during 9/11 and the launch of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

"Every day that I stood at the podium [during press briefings], I was always mindful of my religion and proud to be a Jew, especially when my briefings were carried live on Al Jazeera."

1,200 Montrealers take part in rally

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An estimated 1,200 supporters of Israel – including many Christians – massed in front of the Israeli consulate June 7, waving scores of huge Israeli flags in a passionate show of support in the wake of the May 31 commando raid on a Turkish ship alleged to be carrying both aid and arms to Gaza.

Organized by the Canadian Rabbinical Caucus, led by rabbis Chaim Steinmetz and Reuben Poupko, the event at Westmount Square saw speaker after speaker, including Conservative and Liberal politicians, angrily challenge the world criticism that deluged Israel when nine on board the boat were killed.

Israel counters that its forces were attacked with clubs and knives when they boarded the ship.

"Once again, we are in the ridiculous position of having to defend ourselves for defending ourselves," Israeli consul-general Yoram Elron told the rally, which was "inspired," Rabbi Poupko said, by Ariela Cotler, wife of Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

Elron referred to a demonstration two days earlier in Montreal condemning Israel (others took place worldwide) as a "march of shame."

"When will we see multinational bodies not judge us before the facts are known?" he asked.

Despite the serious reason behind the rally, a boisterous mood seemed to prevail under the sunny sky as the crowd waved their flags, broke into songs and chants of "Am Yisrael chai" and brandished signs such as "Des Québécois aux cotés d'Israel" and, "No Excuse for Terror!"

The crowd loudly cheered speakers on numerous occasions, reserving its most sustained show of approval for Rabbi Poupko, as well as for the two Tories on-hand to speak, MP Pierre Poilievre (Nepean-Carleton) and freshman senator Leo Housakos, and Irwin Cotler.

"Getting a lecture on human rights from Turkey is like getting a lecture in business ethics from Al Capone," Rabbi Poupko said, referring to the outcry from the Turkish government in the wake of the raid.

"Considering Turkey's genocide of the Armenians," he continued, "they have no right to talk on how to treat other people.

"This was not a 'blockade,'" he added, saying it should have been more accurately described as a "weapons inspection protocol."

In his remarks, Rabbi Steinmetz wondered angrily why protesters who marched two days earlier against Israel never do the same "for those oppressed in China, Turkey, Darfur and Iran."

Students pray for rabbi with brain tumour

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Keren Green read tehillim before her wedding for luck. Now she'll be reading them to try to save a life.

Green is one of dozens of students who will be part of a tehillim circle for Rabbi Daniel Elkin of Beth Israel Congregation in Kingston, who will undergo surgery at Toronto Western Hospital for a brain tumour at the end of June.

The growth, which is near the rabbi's pituitary gland, is likely not cancerous, but can be dangerous if not removed.

Rabbi Daniel Elkin, centre, who will be undergoing brain surgery, officiated at Keren and Alex Green's wedding this May. [Hudson Taylor photo]

"I'm a little bit more tired at this point, but it's not a rapidly growing growth," Rabbi Elkin said, adding that "It's got to come out."

Rabbi Elkin, 66, has been spiritual leader at Beth Israel, one of two shuls in Kingston, for the last 13 years. The former teacher and social worker grew up in Montreal and studied and worked in England, Israel, New York and Seattle before settling in Kingston, where he became involved not just in community life, but in student life.

For Green, who studied drama and Jewish studies at Queen's University in Kingston from 2004 to 2008, he was more than a religious leader. He was, and is, a friend.

"My first Shabbat in Kingston was during frosh week in September 2004. Because I'm observant, I didn't want to be part of frosh week," Green, who moved to Kingston from Toronto, said.

Instead, she decided to visit the Beth Israel Shul, a modern Orthodox synagogue.

Rabbi Elkin was the first person she met.

"I walked in and Rabbi Elkin was standing in the hallway. He turned to me and said, 'You must be new here.... here, this is Leah, you guys can be friends, sit beside her. I'll take care of you,'" she said. "There's seriously not a bad bone in his body. He's one of a kind. He's a really, truly amazing person."

Rabbi Elkin, who found out that he had a brain tumour in mid-May and told his congregation soon after, said even though he's received a positive prognosis, he appreciates the students' support.

"I can use all the prayers I can get. Brain tumours are not small things. It's not supposed to be life-threatening, but you're going under the knife. The doctors don't give you a 100-per-cent guarantee," he said.

Green is studying for her master's of education degree at the University of Toronto now, but she still sees Rabbi Elkin, who officiated at her wedding on May 2, as her rabbi.

"I always come back [to Kingston] because I miss the shul. Queen's was fine, but it was the shul that made it for me," Green said.

And she's not alone.

The rabbi reaches out to Jewish students at Queen's through Shabbat dinners and Talmud Torah, a school that several university students taught at. Rabbi Elkin is also involved in Hillel and the Hillel House is on Beth Israel's property.

So when his congregants, many of them students, heard about his surgery, they reacted the only way they knew how – by organizing a traditional prayer circle and reciting passages from Tehillim, the Book of Psalms, for someone who is ill.

The tehillim circle will function both online and in the form of a group reading in Kingston the day before Rabbi Elkin's surgery, on June 27.

The entire book of Tehillim will be split into parts and read both in Kingston and by former Queen's students in other cities, possibly through social media sites and Skype.

For Shira Sasson – who, along with Eric Chapman, will be Queen's Hillel president next year – Rabbi Elkin is an important part of student life.

"The students were able to get a sense of a Jewish community around them when they were in Queen's. That was through Queen's Hillel, but also through the rabbi's help," said Sasson, who is helping to organize the tehillim circle through social media sites such as Facebook.

She added that, since the rabbi and his wife are firm believers in prayer, this initiative seemed most appropriate.

"It would be so meaningful for him to see everyone joining together, using the strength he's given the community to pray for him and his family," said Sasson, who next fall will be entering her fourth year studying history at Queen's. "It's a Jewish way to respond."

Rabbi Elkin will be going for a consultation on the day of his surgery to make sure doctors can operate on the tumour.

"It's only about 95 per cent sure I'm going in for surgery. If they don't like me, they'll do a botched job," he joked, adding that he plans to continue his work at Beth Israel after the surgery.

"My contract is for 140 years," he said. "God willing, I'll heal and be able to continue."

For more information about the tehillim circle, visit the Facebook group Tehillim for Rabbi Elkin, which has more than 70 members.

Bike ride raises funds for victims of terrorism

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

Some 40 people took part in the Gidion One Family Fund bike ride on June 6, and raised more than $50,000, despite the downpour.

The funds from the 55-kilometre ride around Lemonville, a small community north-east of Toronto, will go to help victims of terror and their families in Israel.

One Family Fund is a non-profit organization dedicated to providing financial, legal and emotional assistance to Israel's injured and bereaved. This year, the ride celebrated the life of Gidion Lee, a former member of the Yidden on Wheels Motorcycle Touring Club (YOW) and a One Family Fund volunteer.

Born in 1934 in Israel, Lee immigrated to Canada in 1966. With a passion for motorcycling, he joined YOW shortly after the club was formed and became an active member. To the Yowies, Lee will always be known as "one of those guys that took long rides with friends for weeks on end, had a huge heart and gave everyone a warm welcome."

The One Family Fund remembers Lee for his generosity and kind spirit. As a van driver for the organization, he took visiting Israeli children and their families to Niagara Falls. He was also responsible for helping marshal the annual bicycle fundraiser, which is now a cornerstone of the YOW charity initiative.

In addition, Lee helped organize the Yowie Ride to Remember (Holocaust Memorial Day) pilgrimages, his son, Jeff Lee, said. The first ride took place in Washington D.C., in 2005, where hundreds of Jewish motorcyclists "asserted that despite the best efforts of some of world's sickest minds, the Jewish People were still alive and kicking, with a vengeance."

At this year's One Family Fund ride, Jeff said it was an honour that his father was recognized for being such an important part of "a great organization whose purpose is truly altruistic." On a personal level, he said it's nice to know that the effort his father put forth to help the organization was much appreciated. "The ride was important to [my dad], so it's now become important to us."

Pam Albert, executive director of One Family Fund Canada, said Lee was one of the first volunteers to help when the organization was launched. "We started our group seven years ago, but he joined us about six years ago when we needed help interacting directly with victims that would visit. He… has added so much to our organization."

Albert said One Family Fund deals with each family unit individually and figures out how to meet the needs of every member. "We are the connector. Our goal is to help the family return to their functioning level prior to an attack, on all levels. We also help every Israeli citizen who is in an attack, which is unique."

An attack lasts seconds, but the aftermath lasts a lifetime, Albert said. "We are the family that will be there for the victims as they go through numerous and varying traumas, both physically and emotionally, as they heal, and the healing process takes years. We are the constant that is there for them."

Jeff said his father felt strongly that the victims of terror, who in most cases are innocent children, should not be allowed to forget what childhood can and should be.

"Because of its randomness, terror often leaves its victims feeling utterly alone and defenceless," he said. "Adults and children alike can end up being extremely fearful of common, everyday things such as loud noises and large crowds. A car backfiring can be sufficient to send a small child into a hysterical panic. Left untreated, these fears can easily overwhelm a person and destroy their life completely."

Albert said she has seen victims who were injured four or five years ago, who are only now able to start a new career, go back to school, be physically stable enough to function, or simply experience normalcy in their lives. "This takes a long time. Or, it may be that the family is doing well except for one child, who needs more emotional counselling for post-traumatic stress disorder and more support because they cannot function in school."

At this year's bike ride, Albert said she was delighted to see the Toronto community unite to support the Israeli community. "It's wonderful to see young adults and teenagers who understand that we have an obligation to support the land and people of Israel."

Albert said a victim once told her that every Israeli is like a soldier, living on the home front so that we in the Diaspora can have a place to call home.

Albert's favourite aspect of the bike ride was seeing Jews from different walks of life and different age groups come together to support the victims of terror.

"I know that this is something I feel an obligation to do, but to see others join me in these efforts warms my heart and gives me hope for our future."

Jeff said helping victims of terror "is neither as flashy or popular as most other causes. However, these victims can be quite strongly impacted, first by the negative aspects of their experience, and second by the positive aspects of seeing that there are actually people that do give a damn."

It's become a family affair, Jeff said. His brother, Rob Lee, assisted with marshalling the ride on his father's bike. In addition, Rob's son Kobi did the ride on his own bicycle, which "gave him a sense of completion as well as a feeling that his bond with his Saba was still intact in some way."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

Women talk about experiences with domestic abuse

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Elissa, 46, a survivor of domestic violence, finds it "cathartic" to talk about her life.

The mother of four children, ages 12 through 19, joined Jewish Women International of Canada's (JWI/C) speaker's bureau after she answered an ad in The Canadian Jewish News that said the bureau was seeking survivors of domestic violence to tell their story at community programs.

Penny Krowitz, JWI/C executive director, said the aim of the bureau is to "give a face to abuse. It is very powerful for women to see other women, just like them, tell their story."

Krowitz said that she opens the program with some information on domestic violence, then the survivor speaks, followed by a question-and-answer period. "It puts light on the issue. This proves that it can happen to anyone."

Elissa, who met her husband when she was a university student, said the abuse started right away. "We had a little fight, and he called me a nasty name. When I was that young, though, I didn't see it as a problem. I just saw it as horsing around.

"Why didn't I say, 'Go away?' I was enamoured with him. I was enthralled by his looks."

She said that throughout their relationship and subsequent marriage, whenever he got abusive, "I always sought forgiveness. I was always trying to get his approval."

When she was pregnant with their fourth child, she said, he pushed her off a porch, and she tore ligaments in her ankle. "There was always a power struggle. It was all about his problems, his ego, his needs."

Psychologically, she said, "I was brainwashed. I was in denial, otherwise how could I have lived like that?

"Fear was the overriding element – it permeated our relationship. I was always afraid of doing something wrong. I walked on eggshells. A relationship is like a pendulum, and in an unhealthy relationship, the pendulum is unbalanced."

She said that domestic abuse leads a woman to believe that she is no good. "Every decision I made was second-guessed. I never felt confident to make one on my own. Even in the grocery store I thought I could buy only what he wanted."

She has a new boyfriend now, she said, "and I asked him if I could make the television louder. He said 'Why did you ask? Just make if louder.' That behaviour was left over from my husband."

Elissa said that during her marriage, "misery became my normal. I had almost become a tragic hero of my own life story. I didn't know any other way of life. I forgot that there was another way to live. I always thought he was in love with me, though. I mistook his control for love and devotion.

"He eventually had an affair, and that blew away everything I had felt. Even then, though, I thought I couldn't leave him."

In speaking to other women, Elissa said, she wants to stress that there is another life. "I tell them that everyone is entitled to peace of mind, and it is never too late to gain their own life back. Happiness is out there."

Krowitz said that the women who become part of the speaker's bureau "are giving a gift to other women – their intimate selves, and I am in total awe of all of them."

She said that JWI is planning an open forum aimed at teens ages 12 to 15 and their parents about understanding healthy relationships – teens and parents will meet separately – on Oct. 21.

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Twins' haunting music based in folklore

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Dark, haunting myths and folklore inspire the songwriting of Ghost Bees, identical twin sisters whose performances are distinguished by their beautiful harmonies.

They've been going through some changes lately, though, and the sisters, Romy and Sari Lightman, 25, are planning to rename their band Tasseomancy.

The new name is a perfect fit for them, as tasseomancy is the art of reading tea leaves – a form of divination that has been passed down through their family, beginning with their great-great-grandmother, Clara Chernos.

The band has become something of a tribute to her, with her face appearing on a cake on the cover of their previous album, also named Tasseomancy.

Chernos was an orphan who immigrated to Canada in 1913 to escape the Russian pogroms, Romy says, adding she learned about her from her grandmother, Merle Snider.

Their initial interest in investigating Chernos came from a Celtic shaman, who advised them to look for a matrilineal relative, Romy says, adding that their grandmother immediately identified this link as Chernos.

And coincidently, one day when she was singing in synagogue, Romy says her grandfather heard her voice and told her she sounded exactly like Chernos.

These familial stories inspire these musicians, particularly because they "contribute to our own existence," Romy says.

"There's something about being in the Old World," Sari says. "It's so different from how we exist today."

They agree that ancestry is not something of the past, but rather is a necessary part of understanding yourself.

And it's this fascination that contributed to a connection with Israel when they visited the country two years ago.

Sari describes Israel as a place that links so many civilizations.

"I envision the land there as these sediments of rock," she says, "and if you keep going deeper and deeper, [you'll see] so many people have lived there and existed there before us. It's pretty humbling."

"But the things we're pulling on has less to do with Israel and more to do with the Old World," Romy says.

Some of the new material is inspired by Yiddish folklore and ghost stories, for example, the myth of a dybbuk, a spirit that inhabits someone's body after death.

There's the idea of romanticizing the Old World, since it's so different from the modern way of life, Sari adds.

"There's so much mysticism and myth that's so involved in our ancestry that we can't really comprehend because we don't live like that anymore," she says. "Practising any kind of marginalized religion wasn't really easy, so there's a lot of passion and suffering."

Although they spent their childhoods in Thornhill, Ont., and their teenage years in Toronto, Sari describes them as having been "musically conceived in Halifax," where they moved for school at 17 years old.

"There's this period in one's life [where] it's almost like a second coming, when you kind of come into yourself in whatever way that may be," Romy says, adding that if they hadn't moved to the East Coast, they may not have become the people they are today.

They just finished their new album, In a Glass, Darkly, which Sari describes as having a heavier and fuller sound than their last, and involves experimenting with different sounds and pedals. Instrumentation on the album, by Romy and Sari, includes guitar, banjo and mandolin.

The Ghost Bees discovered tea-leaf reading runs in the family

The album will likely be released later this year.

"It's a winter record," Romy says. "It was recorded in the winter, and as much as we thought we'd be able to put it out sooner, I think we're both content with waiting for the right allies to put it out."

They're currently signed with Youth Club Records, a Halifax-based one-man-show record label, but they are on the hunt for a new label.

"[Youth Club Records] definitely facilitated a time and a place," Romy says, "but similar to us changing the band name, we're looking for more help and we want to give this album its proper..."

"Leverage," Sari says, finishing the sentence.

Although they say they've always been singing together, it wasn't until their early 20s that they began to accompany each other on their independently written songs.

That's essentially the model of their writing process. They write them separately, then join forces to complete the song.

"Whoever's song it is, the other person will back it," Romy says.

The lyrics tend to tell stories, as the duo come from a more literary background than a musical one. But the music creates the feeling and the essence of the songs.

"It's more about the language of music than the language of words," Romy says.

There is a recurring theme of isolation in the songs, she says, which may have stemmed from her experiences living in an artist residency on the Toronto Islands.

"It was a pretty lonely time in the month of November, which is why I think the winter resonates in the record," she says.

For now, they're back in Toronto, and will perform two shows as part of the annual North By Northeast music festival and one show at the Toronto City Roots Festival.

Being back in their hometown, they can reconnect with old friends and people in the Jewish community who are also interested in the arts and music scene, Sari says. "It's exciting because before we left, no one was really their own person at 17, so it's interesting to see how they've all grown and developed."

Both women have grown and developed significantly since they were teenagers, they say.

From teenagers living in the big city to women in the East Coast, the Ghost Bees have also grown into their unique style of eerie, mysterious music.

The Ghost Bees play at C'est What and the Gladstone Hotel on June 18, as part of the North By Northeast festival (www.nxne.com), and on June 26 at the Toronto City Roots Festival (http://torontocityroots.com). Visit myspace.com/ghostbees for more information.

Iran sanctions a positive step, Netanyahu says

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said the fourth round of sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program, approved by the UN Security Council last week, is a positive step.

But in responding to the decision, he expressed hope that it would lead countries to take broader economic and diplomatic measures, including sanctions on the Iranian energy sector.

The United States also hailed last Wednesday's UN vote to impose further sanctions, but a defiant Iran immediately vowed to continue with its nuclear program.

"The UN Security Council resolution..., led by the determination of [U.S.] President [Barack] Obama, is a positive step," Netanyahu said. "The resolution made clear to Iran that the world's leading powers oppose its nuclear program.

"The biggest danger to peace is that the most dangerous regimes in the world will use the most dangerous weapons of all. The international community needs to continue to keep the prevention of this threat at the top of its agenda."

Michael Oren, Israel's ambassador to the United States, said the sanctions "can serve as a viable platform for launching very far-reaching sanctions by the United States or like-minded nations against Iran."

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Those sanctions could be aimed at Iran's ability to import gasoline, he said.

"They have a lot of oil, but not a lot of refined oil or the ability to export oil abroad," Oren said.

The resolution also creates a basis in international law for nations to target Iran's energy and banking sectors and to target third-party entities – companies, individuals and states – that deal with Iran's energy sector.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper said Canada fully supports the sanctions.

"Canada strongly urges Iran to agree to a constructive dialogue with China, France, Germany, Russia, the United Kingdom and the United States with a view to reaching a diplomatic, negotiated solution as soon as possible," he said in a statement last week.

"In the meantime, Canada will use its G-8 presidency to maintain international focus on Iran's nuclear program. Canada will fully implement these sanctions, and we stand ready to implement additional sanctions until Iran meets its international obligations."

Obama said the new sanctions send an "unmistakable message" that the international community will not allow Iran to develop nuclear weapons.

Speaking shortly after the Security Council voted to impose some of the toughest sanctions on Iran so far, Obama faulted the Islamic state's leaders for failing to seriously address concerns about the country's nuclear activities.

"These are the most comprehensive sanctions that the Iranian government has faced," Obama said.

Iran immediately rejected the resolution against its nuclear activities, vowing to continue enriching uranium.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad dismissed as "valueless" the resolution, which passed by 12 votes to two with one abstention – Brazil and Turkey voted against, while Lebanon abstained – saying it should be thrown out.

Sources close to the American administration told Ha'aretz on Thursday that the United States views Turkey's vote against the UN Iran sanctions as a slap in the face, in light of the efforts put forth by the Obama administration to enlist global support for the sanctions.

Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Ramin Mehmanparast called the UN Security Council vote to impose a fourth round of sanctions a "wrong move."

Iran's ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, said after the vote that Iran would not halt its nuclear enrichment activities.

"Nothing will change. The Islamic Republic of Iran will continue uranium enrichment activities," Ali Asghar Soltanieh told reporters in Vienna shortly after the UN vote in New York.

The European Union's foreign policy chief, Catherine Ashton, said Wednesday that she was ready to meet Iran's nuclear negotiator to discuss its enrichment program.

Ashton, who has the backing of all five permanent members of the Security Council – the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China – said shortly after the vote that she was willing to meet Iran's chief nuclear negotiator Saeed Jalili at the earliest opportunity, as long as Iran's nuclear program was on the agenda.

Following the UN vote, several countries hailed the new sanctions.

China, which has been reluctant in the past to back UN measures, urged Iran to comply with the new demands and said the point of the sanctions was to bring Iran back to the negotiation table.

German Foreign Minister Guido Westerwelle said the sanctions send a clear signal that Iran's nuclear program must not produce bombs, but added that the goal must still be a diplomatic solution to the dispute.

Russia's UN Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said Russia's building of the Bushehr nuclear power plant in Iran was proof that Moscow supports the Islamic state's right to peaceful nuclear energy.

Speaking in New York, Churkin said the sanctions were a "forced measure, the implementation of which involved a carefully and proportionally weighted approach," according to Russian news agency Interfax.

Britain also hailed the vote as a "good and powerful" signal from the international community that Iran could no longer refuse to negotiate over its nuclear program.

Foreign Secretary William Hague repeatedly stressed the importance of the support of China and Russia for the UN move. "It's the world saying that Iran cannot just to refuse to negotiate, and that we are not just going to walk away."

In related news, last Friday, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler tabled a petition in the House of Commons calling on the government to "act against the Iranian regime's clear and present danger to international peace and security and increasingly, and alarmingly, to the Iranian people."

Cotler said he hoped the Canadian government would immediately enact the Iran Accountability Act to prevent Iran from achieving nuclear arms; hold Ahmadinejad and other Iranian leaders to account for violating the prohibition against incitement to genocide in the genocide convention; and to support Interpol arrest warrants against Iranian leaders implicated in terrorist acts against the Jewish organization AMIA in Argentina.

"On the anniversary of the fraudulent [Iranian] election we stand in solidarity with the Iranian people, remember... those who have lost their lives and continue to suffer at the hands of this repressive regime, and commit to action as set forth in this petition," he said.

Countries agree on restitution rules

JTA

PRAGUE — Forty-three countries have agreed on non-binding rules for the restitution of property seized by the Nazis during the Holocaust.

The rules were presented June 9 in Prague by Czech Prime Minister Jan Fischer and the U.S. State Department's adviser for Holocaust assets Stuart Eizenstat.

The document recommends principles on which the restitution and compensation for the property of the Jewish victims of Nazi persecution should be based, according to the Prague Daily Monitor.

They deal with private real estate along with religious buildings and property such as synagogues, schools and cemeteries. They also state that private property without heirs should go to indigent Holocaust survivors, Eizenstat told the Monitor. About 250,000 survivors around the world live below the poverty line, he said.

Russia has said it won't follow the recommendations, as have Belarus, Serbia and Malta. Russia wants a reference to the postwar arrangements in Europe, according to the report.

European Union representatives signed the Terezin Declaration in 2009, during the Czech EU presidency. It calls for the restitution of the Holocaust victims' property, including private property.

Turkey-Israel relations strained

The committee will consider the legality of the blockade of Gaza and the legality of the navy's actions. The committee will also determine whether investigations of claims of war crimes and breaches of international law conform to western standards.

Retired Israeli Supreme Court justice Jacob Turkel will head the committee. An Israel Prize laureate, Shabtai Rosen, 93, a professor of international law; and reserve Maj.-Gen. Amos Horev, former president of the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology, are the other members of the committee.

Ken Watkin

The two non-Israeli observers will take part in the committee's deliberations.

The committee will also examine Turkey's position and actions taken by the flotilla's organizers, especially the Turkish group IHH, which allegedly has ties to terrorist groups, as well as the identity of the participants in the flotilla and their intentions.

In response to the Israeli announcement, Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu said Monday that Ankara insists on an international commission to investigate the Israeli commando raid on the Gaza aid flotilla that ended in the death of nine Turks.

"If an international commission is not set up and Turkey's rightful demands are ignored, Turkey has the right to review its relations with Israel," Davutoglu said at a press conference in Ankara.

Responding to Israel's announcement that it had set up its own inquiry that includes two international observers, Davutoglu said, "A commission which will conduct an inquiry into an attack staged in international waters should be international. We demand that an international commission should be formed under the supervision of the UN with participation of Turkey and Israel. We will insist on this matter.

"We believe that Israel, as a country which attacked a civil convoy in international waters, will not conduct an impartial inquiry," he added.

The Israeli raid has led to a severe strain in the once-close ties between Turkey and Israel.

Russia freezes missile delivery to Iran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin has told France that Moscow will freeze a delivery of surface-to-air missiles to Iran, French President Nicolas Sarkozy's office said on Friday following talks between the two men.

Russia has a contract to sell S-300 missiles to Tehran, and there was confusion whether the deal could go ahead under the terms of a fourth round of United Nations sanctions introduced earlier this week to penalize Iran over its nuclear program.

However a spokesperson for Sarkozy told reporters that Putin had confirmed the delivery would be frozen. The official quoted the Russian leader as saying Iran was "very unhappy" and wanted to impose penalties on Moscow for breaking the contract.

Since the UN sanctions resolution against Iran was approved last week, Russia has released several contradicting reports regarding its missile deal with Iran. Russia said last Thursday that it was in discussions with Iran on possible new nuclear power plants in the Islamic state, the country's Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov told reporters.

"We are discussing these [new plants] with our Iranian partners, we are practically discussing this now," Lavrov said.

Earlier last Thursday, Russia's Foreign Ministry said that new UN sanctions against Tehran over its contentious nuclear program do not oblige Moscow to scrap a controversial deal to deliver surface-to-air missiles to Iran.

The clarification came after the Russian Interfax news agency cited an arms industry source as saying Russia would freeze its unfulfilled contract to sell S-300 missiles to Iran after the UN Security Council imposed a fourth round of sanctions on the Islamic Republic, Foreign Ministry spokesman Andrei Nesterenko told journalists, however, that the UN resolution does not apply to air-defence systems, with the exception of mobile missiles.

The report citing an unidentified source in Russia's arms industry, contradicted Russian officials and others who have said the sanctions approved last week with Moscow's support would not affect the air-defence missile deal.

"The UN Security Council decision is binding for all countries and Russia is no exception," Interfax cited the source as saying. "Naturally, the contract to deliver S-300 missile systems will be frozen."

Russia has used its unfulfilled deal to provide Iran with S-300 missiles as a lever in its delicate diplomacy with Tehran and western powers seeking to rein in Iran's nuclear activity, which western powers say is aimed at acquiring atomic weapons.

Israel and the United States have asked Russia not to deliver the missile systems, which can shoot down several aircraft or missiles simultaneously and could potentially be used to protect nuclear facilities.

Iran sends supply ships to Gaza

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran is sending supply ships to blockaded Gaza, state radio said on Monday, a move likely to be considered provocative by Israel which accuses Tehran of arming the Palestinian enclave's Islamist rulers, Hamas.

One ship left port on Sunday and another will depart by Friday, loaded with food, construction material and toys, the report said. The boats would be part of international efforts to break Israel's isolation of the Gaza Strip.

"Until the end of the Gaza blockade, Iran will continue to ship aid," said an official at Iran's Society for the Defence of the Palestinian Nation.

While Israel has long suspected Iran, which rejects Israel's right to exist, of supplying weapons to Hamas, Tehran says it only provides moral support to the group.

On May 31, Israeli troops boarded a flotilla of Turkish aid ships heading to Gaza and killed nine pro-Palestinian activists, all of them Turks.

Public opinion in Muslim countries was inflamed by the killings. An official of the Iranian Red Crescent Society's youth organization said some 100,000 Iranians had volunteered as potential crew for aid ships, Iran daily reported.

A senior Iranian official said earlier that Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards were ready to provide a military escort to aid ships heading to Gaza if Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei so commands.

But the Guards' deputy head, Hossein Salami, said there were no plans to do so. "Such a thing is not on our agenda," he was quoted as saying by the official IRNA news agency on Monday.

Any such military mobilization would risk a major confrontation with Israel, which fears that Iran's nuclear enrichment program is aimed at developing atomic bombs.

Israel regards Iran's nuclear ambitions as a mortal threat. Iran says its nuclear program is meant solely to yield electricity or isotopes for medicine and agriculture.

Zionism is Nazism: Chavez adviser

A foreign policy adviser to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez equated what he called "international Zionism" with "Nazism." Raimundo Kabchi, a professor at the Institute for Higher Diplomatic Studies, which is connected to the Ministry of Foreign Relations, said Israel's "pretensions" over Palestinian territories constitutes "a new Nazism, international Zionism," during an interview June 9 on National Radio of Venezuela. Kabchi also criticized the UN Security Council's decision to pass new sanctions on Iran for what he called the nation's "peaceful" and "scientific" use of atomic energy. Kabchi is cited frequently in the local government press as a Middle East specialist and often is quoted referring to the "Zionist lobby."

OAS rejects anti-Israel motion

The Organization of American States rejected a resolution criticizing Israel for its deadly Gaza aid flotilla raid. The resolution at the annual OAS general assembly, taking place this year in Lima, Peru, was proposed by Ecuador, which has in recent years become close to Venezuela, where the Chavez regime has become a stalwart of international anti-Israel activism. Only 10 of the 33 OAS foreign ministers voted in favour.

Israel news channel?

The Israeli government is looking into creating an international news channel, a lawmaker said. The channel would present Israel's perspective on the news, Public Diplomacy and Diaspora Affairs Minister Yuli Edelstein told the Jerusalem Post. Edelstein said his ministry has acquired some government funds for the project, adding that it also would require private funding. "We could have our own channel, which would at least broadcast on the Internet," he told the Post. "We're not there now, but we are seriously discussing that."

Free dental care for kids

A Knesset committee approved legislation that gives Israeli children up to age eight free dental care. Free care begins on July 1. Free services will include twice-yearly checkups, a cleaning and twice-yearly X-rays. Fillings and extractions will cost a nominal fee. Deputy Health Minister Yaakov Litzman, who runs the ministry, wants to expand coverage to children up to age 18. Some 2,000 health fund dental clinics and 5,000 independent dental clinics are located throughout the country.

Hamas, Turkey to file suits

Israeli media reported that Hamas and Turkey are joining forces to take legal action against Israeli military officers involved in the May 31 interception of a Gaza-bound flotilla. Hamas Justice Minister Faraj al-Ghoul and Turkish Justice Minister Sadulla Ergin agreed during a phone call last week to work together to file suits against those involved in the raid, which left nine passengers dead, the London-based Arabic al-Sharq al-Awsat newspaper reported. The Hamas government in Gaza said that Ergin said Turkey will continue to support the residents of Gaza and that Turkey is willing to pay the price that comes with this support.

Actress was always drawn to fiery Peanuts character

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Lizzie Kurtz was 12 when she first saw You're a Good Man, Charlie Brown.

"Another girl was playing Lucy. I remember watching her and thinking, 'I need to play that part.'"

And now, at 38, she will.

Kurtz, a drama teacher and actor who has starred in musicals such as Cats, will depict the fiery, black-haired Peanuts character from June 17 to 26 in Beyond Boundaries' production of the musical, which follows Charlie Brown and his friends through a typical day.

Kurtz is no stranger to Charlie Brown. She's watched the cartoons since childhood and has always been drawn to Lucy.

"I get her… I think she has this honesty, she says what everybody thinks but doesn't say, so I think there's a private part of myself that wishes I was more like her," Kurtz said, adding that the key to playing the character is understanding that honesty.

"Lucy really wants… to live authentically, even though she's so young. She's so brutally honest… I think children have a lot of depth and insight, and as we get older we tend to cover it up, to mask it," she said.

"If I can unmask Lucy, I can get closer to the heart of her, so it's just about finding the honesty."

Now a drama and vocal teacher at York Memorial Collegiate in Toronto, Kurtz first fell in love with acting as a child, while watching other kids go up on stage at a show.

"I didn't get picked [to go on stage], and I remember sitting in my seat and all of a sudden it was like I got bitten by the bug and I wanted to get up there so bad," she said.

"I was only five or six and I came home that night after the show and said to my parents, 'I want to act.' I didn't even know what it was, it was like something bigger than myself."

Kurtz, whose first musical role was in Annie at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, attended the Claude Watson School for the Arts before going to Sheridan College for musical theatre.

She graduated from Sheridan in 1996 and set herself a goal.

Lizzie Kurtz

Gabi Epstein

"I wanted to get a mega-musical by 30," she said.

And she did.

While doing a show called Forever Swing with jazz singer Michael Bublé, she was cast as the lead in a German production of Cats.

"So I went to Germany for a year," she said.

When she got back to Toronto, Kurtz found it difficult to get any roles, even with her musical experience.

"It was like nobody cared… I came home and… couldn't even get a chorus job," she said. "It really affected me deeply, and I decided to go back to school and get a teacher's degree so I would never feel desperate… It's a terrible feeling. No job is worth being desperate."

Now, as a drama teacher, Kurtz can appreciate her role in the musical.

"The kids are real, and in acting, you need to be real," she said. "I love their honesty."

Charlie Brown is a partnership between Beyond Boundaries productions and organizations that work with children at risk in the Toronto area, which include Jewish Family and Child of Toronto, the Kids Up Front Foundation and the Toronto District School Board. The production will also include drama workshops to introduce kids at risk, aged seven to 12, to acting.

For Gabi Epstein, who plays Sally in Charlie Brown, the show is a perfect fit for this kind of initiative.

"It's such a great show. The music is amazing and the characters are so much fun to play… it speaks well to that age group, but it challenges them a little bit," she said.

Epstein recently finished performing a one-woman musical show called Gabi's Highschool Trailmix and will release her debut album of cover cabaret songs in the fall. She currently works for a birthday party company, which helped her connect to the character of Sally.

"You forget what kids do. It's very easy to fall into that sort of realm of playing them [like they're] stupid. Kids are actually really smart, and they have their own way, their own system of doing everything."

When developing her role, Epstein, 25 was determined not to go the cutesy route.

"I really sort of wanted to make it seem like she was in her own world. She has this genius mind, but nobody knows it except for her," Epstein said.

The show runs at the Lorraine Kimsa Theatre for Young People in Toronto from June 17 to 26. Call 416-862-2222 or visit www.da-capo.ca for more information.

Toronto painter Leah Gold recently teamed up with a group of senior citizens at the Davenport-Perth Neighbourhood Centre to turn a contractor's truck into a moving work of art [inset], as part of Art on the Move, a city-wide initiative where artists and community groups work together to create art-wrapped vehicles to beautify the city. The truck, one of five moving canvases painted by local artists and community groups, was unveiled June 15.

Satin Dolls sing jazz classics for Father's Day

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Listening to the Satin Dolls perform evokes images of the 1930s and '40s. Their music transports the listener to that era of elegance, when men wore top hats and tails, and women wore fur stoles and gowns. That was the time of swing bands, bold tunes, strong vocals and layers of harmony.

On this Sunday night in late May, the Satin Dolls are rehearsing for their upcoming Father's Day concert at Hugh's Room in Toronto. Theatre director Jeremy Smith is helping the women with staging their numbers. Pianist Mark Kieswetter accompanies the women as they run through a number of popular jazz classics that include Bye Bye Blues, Bei Mir Bist Du Shein and As Times Goes By, the famous theme song of the iconic 1942 film, Casablanca.

The women who make up the Satin Dolls – Donna Green, Karen Bell, Ilana Waldston and Aviva Rajsky – all sing in other musical groups as well. They range in age from their mid-40s to mid-50s, and they are all mothers with children of varying ages.

"Between us we have 12 kids," says Donna Green, founder and leader of the Satin Dolls. The mother of two teenagers says the group has its origins in a choir she started 12 years ago, which was made up of parents and teachers from Montcrest School in Toronto.

"When the group disbanded five years ago, I wanted to continue with something," she recalls, noting that the group has evolved with different people participating, except for Bell, who's been there almost from the start.

The singers in the present configuration have been together for around three years, Green notes. "It's working very well… It's the right vocal mix, the right personality blend; the right motivational direction.

"All of these things have nourished me, and I believe it's true for all the Dolls," she says. "We all have a passion for 1930s and '40s jazz. We laugh hard. We work hard. We share our lives."

The Satin Dolls do private functions and community work along with their annual showcase concert.

The women may have a lot of fun together, but Green stresses that it's a serious endeavour. "We rehearse two or three times a week. We work with vocal coaches, and we're accompanied by a pianist and a bass player."

She says music has always been an integral part of her own family life. Green, her husband and her two children all play a variety of musical instruments. She traces her own love of music to her upbringing.

The middle child of philanthropists Al Green and Goldie Feldman, Green says that she was raised with an appreciation of entrepreneurship, community and creativity. These were values that she and her four siblings have all embraced, she says.

Green has been performing as a singer-songwriter since she was 20. She sang at folk festivals and clubs, but the performing slowed down once her children were born.

"It's too hard to keep bands together while you're raising children."

Bell, a teacher at Montcrest and mother of five, has been singing with the Satin Dolls for some 10 years "I absolutely love the women I sing with. We tend to laugh as much, if not more than we rehearse."

She taught Green's son in junior kindergarten and was invited to sing in the Montcrest choir. "I was delighted. I love that genre of music."

A guitarist, saxophonist and singer- songwriter, Bell is also a member of an acoustic folk trio and an R&B band.

Waldston has been singing with the Satin Dolls since 2007. She has a theatrical background, but stopped performing professionally in 1987. When her daughters were little, she joined the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre community choir. "I really missed the ensemble singing experience I used to get in musical theatre."

In her early 40s, Waldston started working with a vocal coach. "I found a voice I never knew I had, and I discovered a love of jazz." She has since been performing solo jazz and cabaret all over Toronto.

Rajsky, a longtime piano bar and session singer, has been with the Satin Dolls for about two years. She divides her performing time between the Dolls and the Jazzabelles, a musical group she started with three other mothers from the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School.

The mother of three is also very active in the school. She chairs the fundraising committee and is past president of the board.

"I love getting together with these women. They're great musicians with huge hearts," Rajsky enthuses. "We have so much fun together. We've become really close friends through our music."

Holy Rollers evokes core values of chassidim

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Keven Asch has chosen a most unusual, even surprising, topic for his first feature film: the involvement of chassidic Jews in the international drug trade.

Inspired by real events in the late 1990s, Holy Rollers unfolds in Williamsburg, an insular chassidic enclave in Brooklyn, N.Y.

Scheduled to open in Toronto and Montreal on June 18, the film is basically a cautionary tale with a wise and enduring message: crime does not pay.

Hollywood has churned out numerous moralistic films about the drug culture, but to the best of my knowledge, this is the first one in which chassidic Jews are at the centre of the plot.

Though Chassidim are highlighted in Holy Rollers, the narrative is depressingly familiar. An innocent, pure young man, Shmuel (Sam) Gold, drifts into a life of crime, cunningly lured there by a more worldly chassidic Jew, Yosef (Justin Bartha).

Shmuel, competently portrayed by Jesse Eisenberg, works in his father's fabric shop. He is under parental pressure to become a rabbi and get married.

Shmuel's friend, Yosef, convinces him there is easy money to be made in smuggling "medicine" to people in need. Being naive and eager to make "some extra gelt," Shmuel buys into his cock-and-bull story and becomes a "mule," an unwitting accomplice in the illegal trade in ecstasy.

Jackie (Danny Abeckaser), the mercurial Israeli American drug dealer who runs the drug ring, is only too happy to recruit chassidic Jews as smugglers. U.S. custom agents do not suspect them.

Jesse Eisenberg, left, Justin Bartha and Jason Fuchs in Holy Rollers opening June 18.

As expected, Shmuel encounters no problems smuggling the pills on flights to Amsterdam. For each trip, he is paid $1,500, plus expenses.

On these trips, he is exposed to the hedonism of the secular world: loose women, nightclubs and porn films.

Shmuel eventually learns the true nature of Jackie's business, but instead of turning back from the abyss, he carries on, swept away by temptations. In the process, he gradually moves away from his traditional religious lifestyle and alienates his family.

Holy Rollers, shot on location in Williamsburg, manages to evoke the timeless rhythms and nuances of Chassidism through such core values as the importance of family and tradition and the respect for authority.

Nonetheless, Holy Rollers is a plodding film, virtually bereft of tension and the frisson of excitement. Everything seems so pre-ordained and predictable.

Nor, with the exception of Shmuel and his explosive father (Mark Ivanir), are the characters even remotely compelling. There is something wooden in their respective personalities. They seem lifeless.

It's a pity, since Holy Rollers brims with considerable potential.

Kuerti performs at Sharon Temple

Internationally renowned concert pianist Anton Kuerti will be performing at The Sharon Temple on June 20 at Music at Sharon 2010.

[Martin Tosolan photo]

Kuerti will be joining the Tokai String Quartet for the second part of an afternoon program, to perform Schumann's Piano Quintet in E flat major, Op. 44.

"The Schumann Piano Quintet is a wonderful, big work, which is very enjoyable for anybody. It was chosen partly because it's Schumann's 200th anniversary of his birth, so everybody is playing a lot of Schumann this year," Kuerti said.

"Three of the movements of the piece are very happy, enthusiastic and warm, and the fourth movement is sort of like a funeral march."

Kuerti has never played with the quartet before, but said they have played at the Mooredale Concert Series in Toronto, of which he is the director.

He took over the Mooredale Concert Series and the Mooredale Youth Orchestras from his late wife, acclaimed cellist Kristine Bogyo, who died four years ago. He also founded the Festival of the Sound in Parry Sound, Ont.

The Austrian-born pianist was raised in the United States. At the age of 11, Kuerti performed Edvard Grieg's Piano Concerto with Arthur Fiedler, the longtime conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra. Kuerti has more than 50 CDs to his credit and has performed all over the world.

He moved to Canada during the Vietnam War. He is an officer of the Order of Canada and was awarded the Canadian Governor General's Performing Arts Award for Lifetime Artistic Achievement.

In 1988, he ran unsuccessfully for the NDP in the federal election. "I'm still politically active, but not running for office," he said. "I take a key interest in political developments."

The 230-seat, Sharon Temple is a national historic site in the small community of Sharon, just north of Newmarket, Ont.

"It's a very special place. It's an historical building with excellent acoustics. It's not very large and it's quite a remarkable place for music," he said.

Graphic novel set in 1904 is relevant today

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

James Sturm, the highly talented Vermont-based graphic novelist (The Golem's Mighty Swing) describes his work as "simple," meaning he's not one to go for excessive artistic flourishes, dense text or overwhelming design.

Like the late, legendary Will Eisner (A Contract with God), he prefers to draw stark, painterly images full of beautiful detail but not to the extent that they detract from his story.

Sturm's latest novel Market Day (Drawn & Quarterly) is very much in this vein, a subtle, poignant and thought-provoking tale of an ordinary man with a special talent, and the not so ordinary day when he recognizes that his abilities are going for naught in the increasingly industrialized world of 1904.

Heading out to market, a typical bustling one in eastern Europe, Mendleman is worried about the impending birth of his first child, about the dangerous world he is bringing that child into and the thoughts of mortality surrounding the birth, in an age when many babies and/or mothers died during childbirth.

He is also beginning to wonder if marriage and a conventional life is the life path he should have taken. His one hope, that he can sell his finely hand-woven rugs to provide for his family is dashed when his usual buyer, Finkler, is gone, replaced by his son-in-law, who's not interested in what Mendleman or the other craftsman from his village have to offer.

Trying to sell his rugs elsewhere, Mendleman discovers, to his shock and chagrin, that his product is not in demand, not when rugs can be made cheaper and quicker by others who are less concerned with quality.

Market Day unfolds quietly and with a seeming lack of drama. Not much seems to happen when Mendleman discovers the truth about the store where he's been selling his rugs but, in fact, everything happens. He learns a hard truth about the outside world that, as a self-described dreamer, he has been oblivious to, and indulges in a bit of drink, which brings out heretofore unexpressed aspects of his personality. Mostly, though, he has to recognize that his future is uncertain just at the point when he needed to know that things were not going to change.

Of course, the meaning and ramifications of change are the whole point of Market Day, as the 20th century and its cookie-cutter, conformist and uncaring mentality begins to make itself known, leading to the horrors of the Holocaust that are not that many years away.

Unlike The Golem's Mighty Swing, which chronicled the adventures of a Jewish baseball team barnstorming across a prejudiced and anti-Semitic America in the 1930s, the world in Market Day is an entirely Jewish one and hence, except for an encounter with his rabbi, that Jewish aspect of his life, as familiar and comfortable for Mendleman as an old hat, is not one that needs to be remarked upon.

Sturm's concerns go deeper than location and religion, delving into a sharp analysis of what comprises art, talent and individualism, and whether there is a place for those virtues in the new "modern" century. A century later than than the era in which Market Day is set, those questions are still pertinent ones.

Fortunately, in great works such as Market Day, James

From bedwetting to Comedy Central Sarah Silverman's guide to success

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

She's not kidding herself. She knows you're reading her book in the bathroom. Probably while having a bowel movement. But that's OK.

"I'm honoured that you've chosen to bring me into this very private and vulnerable part of your life," writes Sarah Silverman in the foreword of her new book, The Bedwetter; Stories of Courage, Redemption and Pee, HarperCollins, 2010.

Silverman, a comedian and star of The Sarah Silverman Program, does talk a lot about bodily fluids in her first memoir. From her bedwetting issues – she wet the bed until she was 16, to her first sexual experience, which was highlighted in the chapter Hymen, Goodbyemen, the comedian is in words what she is on stage – spunky, slightly shocking and deceivingly adorable.

But she's also serious.

Between stories of LSD trips and stripping naked in public 11 times to get a laugh, she also delves into her bout with depression, which lasted through her teen years.

"As quickly and casually as someone catches the flu, I caught depression," she writes, later explaining that she "felt homesick, but I was home."

After seeing several counsellors, one of whom hanged himself before a session, Silverman was prescribed Xanax (alprazolam), a benzodiazepine used to treat anxiety and panic disorder –16 pills a day.

She was also bullied as a child. "I probably have been 10 to 12 per cent raped," she wrote about her experience with a particular bully who, upon hearing that she was a vegetarian, held her down and forced her to eat meat.

Born in 1970, Silverman is the youngest of three sisters. She grew up in New Hampshire, where she was one of only a handful of Jews.

"Growing up, the only way I really sensed I was a Jew was by dint of the fact that everyone around me was not," she writes.

This theme is clear throughout the book, especially in the chapter appropriately titled Jew.

As a child, her parents had no other option but to send her to a convent, the only place with a day care.

When she was a toddler, Silverman learned to swear from her father, who also taught her the power of shock value. At four, when her Nana asked her if she'd like a brownie, Silverman instructed her to place them up her rear end. Which instantly got a laugh.

And she was hooked.

The comedian eventually dropped out of New York University and got a job as a writer for Saturday Night Live, where she spent a day dressed as a monkey, stabbed her boss in the head with a pencil and then got fired.

"I can't actually say which I'd rather believe – that I was fired for stabbing Al Franken in the head, or because in 25 weeks, I'd gotten exactly no sketches on the air," she writes.

In addition to talking about her comedic journey, Silverman gives readers a peak at what happens behind the scenes of her show, which involves constant censorship battles – like getting Comedy Central to agree to have a gay couple on the show, or allowing a description of female genitalia in the script.

One of the best things about The Bedwetter is the photos, e-mails, hate mail and hastily scrawled, half-done jokes that Silverman included.

In one fax, the censors were asked to look over a drawing of a penis to make sure it was appropriate for the show. Both the fax and the drawing are in the book.

The Bedwetter does get a little preachy in between the phallic references and urine talk, especially when Silverman discusses the role of comedy in fighting or supporting racism, but, for anyone with a healthy appreciation for bodily fluids, it's a quick, fun read.

Israel & the Jewish World

Question in Italy: how do we reach non-Orthodox Jews?

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

ROME — The years-long battle that ended recently with the dismissal of the chief rabbi of Turin, Italy, highlights a 21st-century identity crisis afflicting the oldest Jewish community in the Diaspora.

Rabbi Alberto Somekh, who like all recognized rabbis in Italy is Orthodox, had served as chief rabbi in Turin since 1992. But critics said he had antagonized a sizable segment of the city's largely non-observant 900-member Jewish community with a confrontational personal style.

His ouster last month marked the first-ever dismissal of a chief rabbi in an Italian Jewish community.

It focused attention on the challenges facing Italian Jews, ranging from intermarriage, falling birth rates and budget woes to factionalism, political infighting, and sharp divisions over religious practice and Orthodoxy.

In particular, some have become disaffected by what they say is a lack of pluralism and increased Orthodox rigidity in the official community, alienating many.

"Italian Jewry was always nominally Orthodox, but it accepted everybody, observant or not, under one umbrella," Daniele Nahum, 27, the recently elected vice-president of the Milan Jewish community, told JTA. "Now, however, the rabbis here have been adopting a more conservative mentality, and this has pushed some people toward Reform or Chabad."

The Jewish presence in Italy dates back to ancient Roman times. Approximately 30,000 Jews now live in the country, but only about 25,000 are formally affiliated with Italy's official Jewish communities in cities such as Turin, Milan and Rome – and the number dwindles from year to year. Most Jews live in Rome, with about 12,000 affiliated, and Milan, with about 6,000 affiliated.

Italy has no national chief rabbi, but the post of chief rabbi exists as a tenured position in some of the 21 communities linked under the umbrella of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, or UCEI. The UCEI leadership serves as the official political representative of Italian Jewry.

About three years ago, when the community's lay leadership initiated attempts to oust Rabbi Somekh from the Turin post, Turin Jewish community president Tullio Levi accused Rabbi Somekh of "attitudes of ill concealed or even open contempt" for less observant members of the community, as well as a "serious lack of sensitivity and consideration" for their problems.

Community leaders formally ordered Rabbi Somekh's dismissal in early 2009, but the rabbi appealed – his appeal was rejected last month. While Rome Chief Rabbi Riccardo Di Segni said the decision had nothing to do with Rabbi Somekh's Orthodoxy or alleged rigidity, Rabbi Somekh had become a symbol of the lack of openness to non-Orthodox Jewish practice.

Rabbi Somekh himself declined to comment about the issue, but told JTA he "feels good" and is moving on.

Orthodoxy historically has been the only recognized Jewish stream in Italy, and the incident illustrates tensions between the official Orthodox establishment and parts of the broader Jewish population.

"The leadership of the Italian Jewish community is very concerned that it continues to be recognized by the Israeli rabbinical establishment as being Orthodox," said Lisa Palmieri Billig, the American Jewish Committee's representative in Rome. "But the fact is that a very large section of Italian Jews behave as Reform or Liberal Jews would in other countries, or are totally secular. At the moment a feeling of belonging to an emotionally cohesive, culturally unified 'ethnic' group is lacking."

> Rabbinical decisions have sharply limited the conversion of young children of mixed marriages

One especially painful controversy in a country where the rate of intermarriage is high stemmed from rabbinical decisions over the past few years that have barred or sharply limited the conversion of young children of non-Jewish mothers in mixed marriages.

"In Venice, 30 years or so ago, it was sufficient to say to the community that you wanted your child to be Jewish," Anna Vera Sullam, a Venice Jewish community leader, told JTA. "Now it's much stricter. Child conversion doesn't exist anymore."

Others see the problem differently. More than 250 people, for example, joined a Facebook group set up to support Rabbi Somekh after his dismissal was made final.

"It's clear that a great part of the community has lost the intellectual tools to comprehend the role of a rabbi according to Jewish tradition," one member, Paolo Schiunnach, wrote on Facebook.

"Rabbis are not just salaried functionaries, with merely pastoral and preaching roles," he wrote. "The rabbi is a scholar who has received smichah and is authorized to decide on community needs and general and particular halachah," or Jewish law.

Dario Calimani, a member of the UCEI council, said inconsistency and lack of communication in the Italian Rabbinate itself is part of the problem.

"In Italy, there is no national mark for kashrut, there is no unified policy on conversion, there is no halachic co-ordination in general or synergy in the cultural field, there is no agreed policy regarding relations with the Catholic church," Calimani wrote in a recent edition of the Turin Jewish magazine Ha Keillah.

"In a community as small as that in Italy, co-ordinated solutions should be sought," he said. "Instead, we see kashrut treated as a purely commercial question, and conversions that provoke communal crises or are resolved outside the rules."

Hard work vaults Volfson to top tennis ranking

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Although his birth certificate says he's only 12, David Volfson has the demeanour and maturity of someone much, much older. He's also got a burning desire to excel and a work ethic that would put many grown-ups to shame. Add it all together and you've got a mighty dynamic tennis player who is ranked No. 2 in Canada for boys under age 14.

Volfson, a Grade 7 student at Leo Baeck Day School, attained that rarified ranking after first place finishes in singles and doubles at Tennis Canada's U14 Rogers Junior National Championships in Edmonton in April.

Those were, he said, his proudest moments as a player – those and a semifinal finish in an under-12 event in Auray, France, last February and a quarter-final position in the Orange Bowl in Miami.

Oh, and there's the first place finishes in singles and doubles at the Jug Open in Skopje, Macedonia, last month and the loss in the final to No. 1 seed Bogdan Borza of Romania at the Subotica Open in Serbia a little after that.

Those tournaments pitted Volfson against top competitors from around the world.

"It's unbelievable what I achieved in those two weeks," said Volfson of his trip to the former Yugoslavia. "I've worked very hard and I'm happy for what I've achieved, and I've got to continue to work hard."

"I love to play tennis," he said. "I'm very competitive and that's why I think I get these great results, because of my character."

His success on the tennis court has vaulted Volfson to the national program, and for the past four years he's been training at the Rexall Centre at York University with Canada's tennis elite. Not only does he get the best coaching, he has access to nutritionists, sports psychologists and all the other elements of the program designed to develop world class players.

It certainly seems to be helping him beat the odds. In addition to being a year younger than most of his competition (he doesn't turn 13 until September), at five-foot-two and 97 pounds, he's kind of on the small side.

"A lot of the kids I play are much bigger," he acknowledged. "I've got to play smart and tactically to win my matches."

So what does that mean on the court?

"When bigger players hit the ball harder, I neutralize it and send the ball deep so they can't keep attacking me. Then I move up close to the net and attack them."

His coach, Guram Kostava at the Players Edge Tennis Academy, has been working with Volfson to develop his skills and strategy. He also accompanies him on his tennis forays abroad.

Kostava said Volfson's future is virtually unlimited. "He's going to make history, that's what I think. Time will tell, but he has all the potential.

"He's very good at everything, good at the baseline, he's got good first and second serves and he's mentally strong. He has a good fighting spirit.

"He keeps the ball inside and fights until the last point. He's like a machine. He never breaks down."

Kostava believes Volfson will be "the foundation of Tennis Canada" for years to come, and his results abroad prove it. He's moved up in European rankings to 38th place, and "he still has one year to be under 14. Perhaps he'll be in the top 10 or top five," he said.

Volfson took his first tennis lesson when he was four-and-a-half and immediately loved the sport.

"I enjoy hitting the ball. I like the feeling when I hit the ball on my racquet," he said.

And hit it he does. Today, his training regimen would tax anyone but the most fit athlete. He practises six afternoons a week, for about two hours at a time. Two mornings a week, he adds as much as two more hours to his training, and all that doesn't include daily one-hour physical fitness sessions in the gym.

It's gruelling to say the least, though Kostava points out that top European players put in six hours a day, often leading to burn-out.

Volfson, he said, "doesn't work crazy hard, but he works very smart," focusing on technique while not wasting time.

His skill has also allowed him to see the world. Last summer at a competition in Yerevan, Armenia, he tangled with a young Israeli who beat him in singles, but who was also his doubles partner.

David Volfson

The Israelis were so impressed with Volfson that they invited him to train with them at their national tennis centre.

Travelling to Israel is something he'd dearly like to do. His grandparents, who were originally from Belarus, lived in Israel for a time, he said.

"I want to perform in the Maccabiah Games," Volfson said. "And, I want to win it."

With his credentials, he's pretty much a shoo-in to make the Canadian team.

So what does he do when he's not smacking a little green ball around. Is it resting perhaps?

This summer, he'll be taking it easy, he said. There are only a few European tournaments on his schedule, and he's got to prepare for his bar mitzvah in September. When he's not working at tennis, "I like to play soccer, go to school, be with friends, read books and play video games," he said.

Something restful perhaps, like FarmVille?

Not exactly. In fact, Volfson likes to unwind with sports and action video games.

Mature, hard-working and focused, to be sure. But he's still a kid, after all.

The passing of pets

By MICHAEL GORDON

Frisbee, one of my all-time favourite cats, had to be put down. He, unlike our other cats, which were mixed breeds and often "rescue" cats, was a pure Abyssinian-sleek, agile and beautiful and reddish in colour.

The Senior Side of Life

When the day came, I was in great turmoil. My wife, Gilda, his "alpha," with whom he shared his primary bond, was away, and I was left to handle his woeful cries as he lay on the living room carpet, thin from weeks of attempted but inadequate eating, portending his underlying serious disease.

Frisbee was not young, and we had already decided, along with our most wonderful and supportive veterinarian, that we wouldn't "investigate" him more than we had done, which had already been quite stressful for him. Frisbee had taken to crawling under the covers on my side of the bed during the day, even though at night he slept huddled in my wife's hair, where he purred himself to sleep.

I ran down to wake, Eytan, my 20-year-old son, to tell him I had to take Frisbee to the vet to have him put down. "I will go with you," he said, words that melted my heart. I really dreaded taking the cat in a cold, inanimate crate for his last car ride. Eytan bundled Frisbee in his arms for the 10-minute ride, and Frisbee looked out from the crook in his arm and then just nuzzled into him. I was crying uncontrollably.

The process did not take long, and the veterinarian was as supportive as anyone could be. He said sometimes the loss of someone's pet, and companion, is also the loss of a pet owner, if he or she decides against getting another pet, because it was just too much to go through the loss of a pet.

That day, in an e-mail to a colleague, I mentioned Frisbee, and I received a heart-felt commiseration with the account of the shared feelings by my colleague on the sad loss of his dog some years previously. Later, while on the phone with a dear friend to whom I mentioned Frisbee's demise, he told me about his sister losing a dog and how powerful an experience that had been for her. My sister and niece, who have had a menagerie of dogs and cats over the years, undertook a course of end-of-life chemotherapy for one of their dogs, because letting him go without the heroic intervention was too painful a decision.

I recall vividly each of the animals that I have had over my lifetime that died, and each memory carries a sense of loss coupled with feelings of wonderment and warmth when I consider the companionship and affection provided by those lovely creatures. Prior to Frisbee, the need to put down Shamma, our dear Labrador, old, frail and immobile from arthritis, was the most poignant of those experiences.

Pets are wonderful companions for people of all ages, but especially for seniors. A pet's loss might lead some to eschew another pet to avoid the pain of loss. But it might also be considered a reason to get another pet, after a period of mourning, as a tribute to the lost pet. The bond of love and affection can then be shared with a new pet.

We can change our children's habits

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Childhood obesity is a growing problem for Canadians. As a dietitian who sees many overweight children in my practice, I see several areas where we, as parents, need to be more diligent in order to prevent this epidemic from affecting our kids and correct it for the kids already affected.

Some of the obvious causes that I see from a food perspective come from the vast amount of empty calories our kids consume on a regular basis. These calories come in the form of both food and drink and are major contributors to excess weight, as they contribute calories, often lots, but don't fill our kids up. This leads to their eating more and more.

So what are these empty calorie culprits? They are sugar-rich beverages like pop and juice – all juice, even pure juice. These drinks are full of calories and sugar, but do not fill us up! The other culprits are the empty calorie foods, predominantly those containing white flour and white sugar, chips, cookies, candy, crackers, granola bars, sugar cereal, white bread, bagels, chocolate, baked goods. These foods also do not fill us up, so we keep eating!

Think about it. If you came home from school and ate a handful of chips, two cookies and a glass of juice, would you be full? I wouldn't. What about if you had a turkey or peanut butter sandwich, an apple or banana and/or a glass of milk? You'd be full and stay full for a long period of time.

If your kids are eating a lot of these empty calorie foods, the first step is to simply stop buying them and replace them with the good stuff – whole grains, fruits and vegetables and lean protein.

Of course, this epidemic is also due to the level of inactivity of many kids, who sit in front of electronic devices rather than doing something physical. We should all engage in a physical activity daily and set the example for our kids.

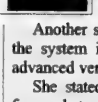
Bar mitzvah think-tank required

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I suggest a community-wide think-tank whose task it is to revamp bar/bat mitzvah training.

This is my conclusion from the column I wrote a few weeks ago, "Does bar/bat mitzvah mean anything?" (May 27), and the responses I received. The article was predicated on the idea that a vast majority of bar/bat mitzvah students are not prepared, or interested, in this Jewish rite of passage.

URBAN WRITER



Some shul leaders felt their particular place of worship had it right.

Rabbi Cory Weiss of Temple Har Zion, wrote: "Our experience at Temple Har Zion suggests it absolutely does [have meaning]."

The rabbi said the children are taught the trope (notes for reading Torah), urged to attend Shabbat services with their parents (and actually learn about the liturgy) and must play a role in a tikkun olam project.

This is indeed progressive, as the deep meaning of prayer is mostly not taught to students, regardless of denomination. When I was in yeshiva, we didn't spend any time on studying prayer.

Temple Har Zion's approach to teaching bnei mitzvah seems to be a positive one. It would be interesting to see how involved the bnei mitzvah are for years after their special day.

Another synagogue teacher wrote me that the system is often antiquated and has not advanced very much over the years.

She stated: "My own experience training for my bat mitzvah was conducted in the old-fashion style of rote learning. The teacher was a curmudgeon who hit me over the knuckles when a mistake was made. There was no explanation of my parshah, and I sat on a bench with a few other students awaiting my turn."

I have seen dozens of children enter "adulthood" with little or no interest in this incredibly important Jewish part of this "rites of passage." A Jewish leader wrote me that it's common for children to study for a year and, unable to read Hebrew once classes were finished, have little knowledge of their portion, or Judaism in general.

Teachers are not the only problem. Often children are dropped off by parents and teachers babysit them. Parents rarely get involved. Shuls frequently hold bnei mitzvah back from learning as much of the service as they might. Expectations of the students are that they can chant the Maftir, Haftorah and sometimes some of the Torah portion, when in fact children can often do more, such as Musaf.

Sometimes we Jews fall so terribly short.

Why not bring together some of this city's finest educators and some bar/bat mitzvah students and develop a comprehensive approach that might include the following.

a) Three months learning one's Torah portion prior to any other lessons. This could be done in a yeshiva way, with a teacher and perhaps using a chevrutah (partner in learning);

b) An intense study of the history of the Jewish people and responsibilities as a community member, including learning leadership skills;

c) Taking on a particular mitzvah, something having to do with tikkun olam;

d) Partnering with a mentor;

e) Learning an area of interest such as Jewish law, musar (learning about personal behavior) or an area that fascinates the student (for example, if one's portion is Noah, learn about the laws of treating animals);

f) And quarterly testing (of parents, too).

We need to demand a more holistic and comprehensive year of study with emphasis on learning and doing good, and less on the caterer.

How about a cross-city think-tank made up of our finest educators to create a groundbreaking model for "A Year Studying the Jewish Rites of Passage"? I have some ideas.

Hold high the flags of our pride

Editorial

The happy young men in the photo on this page are celebrating Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day). More precisely, they are marking the 43rd anniversary of the reunification of the city that was horribly sundered in 1948.

When the fighting in Israel's War of Independence finally came to a halt in 1948, the Jordanian army was in control of the Old City of Jerusalem. Their first order of business was to forcibly remove and expel the entire Jewish population that had lived there for hundreds of years. Their second order of business was to destroy, dismantle and devastate all vestiges of Jewish life there.

East Jerusalem was separated from west Jerusalem, the Old City from the New City by barbed wire, concrete barriers and the ever-wounding memories of forced expulsion and cold death.

Nineteen years later, in 1967, around this time of year, on June 7, the Israel Defence Forces captured east Jerusalem and reunited what had been forcibly and cruelly taken away from the Jews in 1948: the city of Jerusalem.

Contrary to the anti-Israel narrative told so falsely and maliciously by many Palestinian and other leaders, Jewish life in the Old City of Jerusalem did not begin in 1967. Nor did it begin in 1948 when the Jewish state was proclaimed.

Rather, until the Jordanian army cleansed Jerusalem of its Jews, Jewish life had been as constant in Jerusalem as the golden desert colours of the city's stones.

For many people today, the justice of the reunification of the city 43 years ago is an inconvenient truth, an irritating detail of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict They simply do not want to know of it.

But for the Jews who lived then and, of course, for the untold generations who had lived before and who will live forever after, that historic reunification was a cry to the world that henceforth, Jews, too, could live where they had always lived, namely in the Old City of Jerusalem.

In his book The Battle for Jerusalem, (JPS, 1987) Abraham Rabinovich recorded the first official Israeli pronouncement regarding the reunification.

"As he left the Temple Mount, [merely hours after it had been captured, then defence minister] (Moshe) Dayan paused to read a statement to waiting newsmen. "We have returned to the holiest of our sites and will never again be separated from it. To our Arab neighbours, Israel extends the hand of peace, and to the peoples of all faiths, we guarantee full freedom of worship and of religious rights. We have come not to conquer the holy places of others, nor to diminish by the slightest measure their religious rights, but to ensure the unity of the city and to live in it with others in harmony."

Markedly, unlike the manner in which the Jordanians ruled the city from 1948 to 1967, Israel has been true to its word these past 43 years. Peoples of all faiths do have full freedom of worship and of religious rights there.

That Israel has not been able to live in harmony or even grudging coexistence with its neighbours, alas, has not been for lack of trying by the Jewish state. Rather, it has been due to the obsessive, all-consuming, dignity-destroying score of resentment, grievance and victimhood that remains unsettled, cultivated like a delicate flower, in those same neighbours' hearts.

Despite its flaws and the unending security pressures, Israel is trying to build a society that encompasses Dayan's words. Its neighbours, however, try ceaselessly to destroy.

Thus, we join the young men in the photo above in their celebration. In these pages of Tribute to Israel, we too raise high the flags of our pride.

We urge you to join us.

Am Yisrael Chai.

Tribute to Israel

Israel honours Canadian war ace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

George (Buzz) Beurling

Richard Beurling lay a wreath for Israel's 22,684 fallen soldiers on Yom Hazikaron/Memorial Day this past April.

Beurling's older brother, George (Buzz) Beurling, a Canadian World War II fighter pilot ace, was among those honoured posthumously, even though he had never set foot in Israel.

He was one of hundreds of Canadian war veterans who volunteered their services to the new state of Israel.

He and his co-pilot, Leonard Cohen of Liverpool, England, were killed in May 1948 while ferrying a Canadian-made Norseman light transport plane to Israel, just days after its first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, declared Israel's independence.

Their plane, which was to be used as an ambulance aircraft for the fledgling Israeli Air Force, crashed en route from Nice, France, while trying to land in an airport in Rome.

Beurling's and Cohen's bodies were burned beyond recognition.

Beurling flew for Britain's Royal Air Force and the Royal Canadian Air Force, downing 31 enemy aircraft in a brief but spectacular career.

He was buried in Rome. But in 1950, he was interred in an Israeli military cemetery at the foot of Mt. Carmel in Haifa.

For six decades, the 100th transport squadron to which Beurling belonged paid tribute to him in remembrance ceremonies. Two years ago, the Israeli officer in charge of the Israel Defence Forces' casualty and loss unit, Lt.-Col. Danny Shneidman, discovered that Beurling had living relatives in Canada.

Last year, he contacted his brother, a 78-year-old retired Bell Canada employee in Toronto.

Shneidman invited him to Israel to attend Yom Hazikaron. Beurling accepted the invitation, taking his wife, Joan, and their two daughters, Krista and Janice, on the 3 1/2 week trip.

It was not his first time in Israel, having previously been there in 1975 and 2008 to visit his brother's grave.

The commemorative ceremony he and his family attended took place near Jerusalem and was attended by several thousand Israelis and foreign dignitaries.

"It was a wonderful honour to be there," said Beurling, an evangelical Christian whose ancestors are of Dutch and Swedish descent.

"We had a very good time. I was touched by Israel's generosity and friendship. I love Israel. It's a beautiful country. A great nation."

Beurling said he was not looking for closure, since his older brother had already been recognized by Israel and Jews in Canada.

Richard Beurling and his wife, Joan, in Israel

"We've had a very warm relationship with Israel and the Jewish community," said Beurling, noting that he is a member of the Wingate branch of the Royal Canadian Legion, and that Congregation Shaar Shomayim in Montreal – Canada's oldest synagogue – honoured his brother decades ago.

A Christian Zionist, he does not feel that his invitation to visit Israel was long overdue.

"Israel has always honoured George," said Beurling, a devout Protestant weaned on biblical stories. "Israel and the Jewish people have just been wonderful. We have not been neglected."

Beurling said he had no advance knowledge that his brother planned to volunteer for Israel. "George never talked about it."

Born in 1921 and raised in the Montreal suburb of Verdun, George Beurling was an adventurous type who joined the Royal Air Force after the outbreak of the war. The Royal Canadian Air Force rejected him because he did not have a sufficient academic background.

Flying a Spitfire, he flew his first combat mission on Dec. 25, 1941, two weeks after the United States declared war on Japan and Germany.

Though he downed a succession of German planes in defence of Malta, he was himself shot down four times over that Mediterranean island.

Transferring to the Royal Canadian Air Force in 1943, he was posted to an operational squadron.

He was honourably discharged toward the end of 1944, ending his career as Canada's most successful combat pilot, with 31 "kills" to his credit.

The late Sydney Shumelson, a fellow Montrealer and Canada's most decorated Jewish combat pilot, recruited Beurling for the Israeli Air Force.

Eager for action after the war, he found his calling as one of Israel's first military pilots.

"He wanted to fly," said Beurling. "But, like myself, he thought that Jews were God's people, and that Israel belonged to the Jewish people."

He added, " I believe it is important that the people of Israel know that most evangelical Christians stand firmly with them."

The Twinned Peace Theatre and Cinema Schools program at the Peres Center For Peace caters to Palestinian and Israeli high school students, aged 15 to 18 years, from disadvantaged and peripheral communities. Schools are selected and "twinned" together as partners in the program. The program is made up of four components: 1) introductory education for the values of peace workshops; 2) theatre or cinema workshops; 3) joint Palestinian-Israeli meetings; and 4) end of program event.

Teaching the ABC of love

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel 21c

Kids in Africa with HIV will probably survive. Today they get anti-virals to stop the progression of HIV into full-blown AIDS. But health-care workers treating these kids know that it's just as important to heal the mind as it is to heal the body.

A program developed by an Israeli early childhood educator has been chosen to prepare them for the life ahead by addressing the many aspects of their emotional development that have been neglected and impaired.

Prof. Pnina Klein
[Flash90 photos]

To take on the challenge of nurturing and growing the minds and potential of African kids with HIV-AIDS, the U.S. National Institute of Mental Health, through the University of Michigan, has developed a new training program that gives health-care workers and educators in Africa the tools to assess and promote the education of these children. Out of thousands of possible methods and models, the institute chose one developed by Prof. Pnina Klein of Israel's Bar-Ilan University.

"The infants and children in Africa have been receiving medicine to keep them alive and it has been working quite well," Klein tells ISRAEL21c. "But [health-care workers] realized that it's not enough to just deal with the physical problems, especially when we're dealing with infants and toddlers. One's mental health and physical health are interrelated."

Klein's approach, which is being used successfully to help children all over the world, is called Mediational Intervention for Sensitizing Caregivers (MISC). It is now in its second year in Africa, out of a three-year pilot program.

"Prof. Michael Boivin from the University of Michigan participated in one of my workshops for the American Psychiatric Association. That's how he learned about the program. And when the National Institute of Mental Health was looking for a program he suggested mine," explains Klein.

"I couldn't imagine that among all the thousands of programs available that promote development in children, they would choose mine, but they did," says the modest Klein, now in her 60s, who has worked in early childhood education for about 35 years.

At first glance the range of the MISC method is surprising, as it targets children with developmental disabilities, children from low-income families and gifted children. It is an intervention program that is individually tailored to each child, based on analysis of videotaped parent-child interactions.

Research has demonstrated that enhancing the quality of parental mediation vastly improves a child's cognitive performance, as well as social and emotional behaviour.

MISC assesses the "mental diet children receive," Klein explains, adding: "We need a good mental diet as much as a physical one – one with proteins and minerals. Through MISC, we can quantify the quality and number of interactions with young children, including the education they get, and we can measure it and come up with a profile for each child and each interaction."

With this information, those running the MISC program can make suggestions to help improve a child's educational diet and the quality of interactions.

"We are focusing on the roots of the interaction – on feelings, which I call the ABC of love: smiles, looks, eye-to-eye contact, mutual engagement and three basic messages. 'I love you,' conveys the message of self-worth; 'I am with you,' conveys security; and a message that 'It is worthwhile to do,'" Klein tells ISRAEL21c.

These reinforcements allow a child to feel his or her significance and importance in the world, and can help to regulate behaviour.

In Israel, MISC is taught to staff at the Health Ministry's infant care clinics. Requiring no special equipment and easily adapted to any culture, the program is also popular around the world. In Sri Lanka, MISC was initiated by UNICEF (to which Klein is a consultant) and continues under the aegis of Save the Children. Universities sponsor the program in Norway, Indonesia and Ethiopia.

In Sweden it is used to train staff at daycare centres, while at the University of South Florida MISC is part of a special program for minority children. In Uganda, where the program is working to enhance the mental development of young children, "it seems to be working really well," says Klein.

Program has affected the lives of millions of kids

Some of the children benefiting from Prof. Klein's intervention.

"Research data has already been published in a number of countries, and [the program has also been] run in countries like Ethiopia for several years already, for very poor infants and children. And when I say poor, it's a very different connotation from being poor in the U.S.," she asserts.

At the University of Southern California, the method is used to teach kids with attention deficit disorder. Indirectly, the program has affected the lives of millions of kids all over the world. It is widely used by music teachers in the United States, has been found to be successful with gifted children to help them to reach their potential – just as it helps other children to do so – and has improved literacy in general by affecting the way that parents read to their children.

It may be partially because her parents expected a lot from her that Klein has become one of the world's most influential early childhood educators, with her research supported by international organizations such as World Health Organization, UNICEF and Save the Children.

"I received so much love and there were so many expectations. Part of my theory and programs are an outgrowth of realizing all the privileges I received," says Klein. "My parents were not rich but they taught me what's important, how to define and transfer it."

She suggests that her success in life may also be related to the Holocaust. Born in Poland, her family was decimated on both her mother's and father's sides. The only other survivor was one uncle who moved to the United States. Klein was the first baby to be born in her family after everyone was lost. Both her parents had been in hiding during the war and "gone through hell" she says. After the war, when she was an infant, they moved to Tel Aviv.

At 15 Klein took a few courses at a high school in the United States, and just a year later she enrolled at Bar-Ilan University where she studied psychology. She holds a double BSc in psychology and biology and a PhD in education from the University of Rochester, New York.

Married to a geneticist and the mother of three children, Klein lives in Givat Shmuel near Bar-Ilan where she heads the early child development graduate program, school of education, and is director of the Baker Center for Research and Treatment of Children with Special Needs.

As one of the first babies to come to Israel (her family arrived in 1949, a year after the establishment of the state), Klein was honored by being invited to light a torch at the ceremony celebrating Israel's 60th Independence Day, in recognition of her academic research.

A light unto the nations in her own right, many of the world's children will live richer lives thanks to Klein's profound and perceptive work.

Klein works with children.

Science burns in her bones

By ABIGAIL KLEIN LEICHMAN
Israel 21c

As a child, Smadar Cohen went to the library in Petah Tikvah every day to borrow a book to read overnight. That was the rule: One book per customer. When her father noticed how she absorbed the knowledge in each book, he quietly supplied her with a second card. Two cards, two books. That was the kind of home she grew up in.

Today Prof. Cohen is the head of Ben Gurion University's (BGU) department of biotechnology engineering. She tells ISRAEL21c that her parents used their modest means to encourage their four children to attain knowledge and culture. "I was thinking of becoming a musician," she says, "but science really burned in my bones."

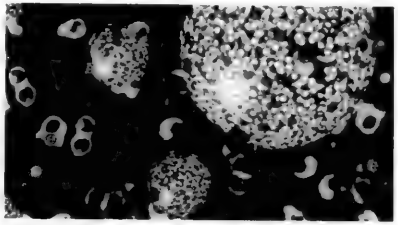
Cohen has focused on two main, cutting-edge uses of polymers: tissue regeneration and controlled delivery of therapeutic proteins (a.k.a. vaccines.) She recently received the $100,000 Rappaport Prize for Excellence in Biomedical Research for her innovations in the application of biomaterials for regenerating tissues. And after several years of work with her students and her colleague, Prof. Jonathan Leor, she also invented an algae-based material that prevents cardiac tissue damage following a heart attack.

Selected in 2008 by Windhover Information as one of the top 10 most promising cardiovascular projects in development, the resulting product is now in clinical trials in the United States after New Jersey-based Ikaria Holdings bought the license from Jerusalem's BioLineRx for $285 million, and future royalties on the product.

Another of her groundbreaking polymer inventions now on the market is the AlgiMatrix 3D Culture System. This animal-free 'bio-scaffold' is likely to revolutionize the way disease states and drug responses are predicted in such fields as toxicology, drug development, cancer and stem cell research, and tissue and organ engineering.

Last November, Cohen received the $50,000 Teva Founders Award for her research on biomaterials to regenerate bodily tissue. Although Israel's Teva Pharmaceuticals usually awards two of these prizes annually, Cohen was the sole recipient for 2009.

Upon completing high school, army service, and a graduate biophysics degree at Tel Aviv University, Cohen opted for a post-doctorate at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT.) Cohen had heard about the work of MIT professor Robert Langer, who was researching the use of polymers in drug delivery. This was exactly what she wanted to do. But lacking an engineering background, which is normally required at MIT, Cohen knew she'd have to fight hard for a spot in Langer's lab. She wrote him letter after letter until he contacted her TAU adviser and said he was coming to Israel and wanted to interview the persistent student.



A photo that captures the image of biological scaffolding in cells. [Israel 21c photo]

"Later, he told me that he saw the glint in my eyes and said, 'I want her in my lab,'" Cohen recalls. She went off to MIT at the end of 1987.

Given a free hand by Langer, Cohen perfected a polymer delivery system for vaccines, eventually establishing a program with the World Health Organization to introduce stabilized vaccines to Africa. Needing no refrigeration, they slowly release a full dosage, eliminating follow-up shots.

In 1992, she returned to Israel to develop BGU's biotech engineering department. Among Israeli universities, this department is unique in that its students are engineers working in biology. Most universities in Israel that offer biotech engineering tend to stress biology over engineering. Twice the university bestowed upon Cohen its Presidents Award for Excellence in Science – first in 2006 and again this year as part of its 40th anniversary celebrations.

"I fulfilled a dream when I became a researcher in academia. I feel that every year I learn new things from my students and become younger and younger," says Cohen, who in 2008 was ranked 12th on Lady Globes magazine's list of the 50 most influential women in Israel. She holds 26 patents and sits on the scientific advisory boards of several biotechnology and nanotechnology companies.

Despite a total of almost a decade at MIT, Cohen says there was never any question that she would return to Israel. "When I started to dream in English, I knew it was time to go home," she says. "A few years ago, I got an offer from a U.S. university and also one in England, and I said 'no.' I really love Israel and I love living here. And I am doing really well here."

PLEADING FOR SAFETY ON THE ROADS

Eighty smashed-up cars assembled in a 20-metre high statue in the shape of a bottle of wine can be seen these days on the Ayalon highway, the main coastal highway near Tel Aviv. The sign on the display says: "If you drink, don't drive." The statue is the latest effort by the authorities in the battle to reduce the number of traffic accidents in Israel. The display was put together by Nur Signs, the Or Yarok Road Safety Organization, the Avnon Shelmor Avichai Advertisement Firm and the Ramat Hasharon Municipality.

Parting with the truth: a response to National Geographic

By Uri Goldflam

I have fond memories of National Geographic magazine. As a child, I would wait with growing anticipation for the arrival of the beige envelope containing the yellow magazine. I loved to lose myself in the pages of wonderful stories and amazing photos.

It's because I hold National Geographic to be of superb quality that I was so shocked by an article in the April 2010 issue called "Parting the Waters." The inaccuracies and downright lies in the article are many, and even more disturbing is the Goebbels-like choice of pictures in the adjoining photo gallery. A truly astonishing editorial choice.

Let's examine some passages from the piece:

"Upstream, at the Sea of Galilee, the river's fresh waters are diverted via Israel's National Water Carrier to the cities and farms of Israel, while dams built by Jordan and Syria claim a share of the river's tributaries, mostly for agriculture. So today the lower Jordan is practically devoid of clean water, bearing instead a toxic brew of saline water and liquid waste that ranges from raw sewage to agricultural runoff, fed into the river's vein like some murky infusion of tainted blood."

The real source of the shortage

Israel takes all the water from the Jordan river leaving Jordan and Syria with scraps. Right? Wrong. (But what a great literary description.)

Israel's National Water Carrier draws water from the Sea of Galilee itself (not from the river) from within Israel's pre-1967 borders at the Sapir site. It was completed in 1964, so you can't really blame the occupation on this one. It uses, on average, 500 million cubic metres of water per year.

Jordan draws the water from the Yarmouk – 470 million cubic metres, the second largest river in the region and the Jordan River's fourth tributary. Jordan also receives 50 million cubic metres of water annually from Israel from the Sea of Galilee as part of the peace treaty signed in 1994.

Do these numbers paint a different picture? A view from the Jordanian side of the Jordan river valley will show a flourishing breadbasket, 100 kilometres long and three kilometres wide. You'll see the latest agricultural technologies, irrigation systems (technology transferred from Israel to Jordan, beginning in the 1970s) and co-operation between neighbouring countries, including Israeli farmers tending to their orchards on Jordanian sovereign territory. But why report the good news.

Next:

"One day last April, [Gideon] Bromberg [Israeli co-director of Friends of the Earth Middle East] led me to the natural spring that provides water to Auja, a Palestinian village of 4,500 people that climbs the barren hills a few miles west of the Jordan River near Jericho. Fed by winter rains, the spring was flowing from a small, boulder-strewn oasis... 'Auja is totally dependent on this water for agriculture,' Bromberg said. 'As soon as this spring dries up, there'll be no more water for farming.' ... As Bromberg and I followed the Auja spring east, we passed a complex of pumps and pipes behind a barbed-wire fence – a Mekorot well, drilled 2,000 feet deep to tap the aquifer. 'Blue and white pipes,' Bromberg said. "This is what water theft looks like in this part of the world.'"

This is a neat trick. Half-truths and a stretch, a twist and a big lie. To drive the message home – a picture of the dried up, sunburnt village, a deserted greenhouse and a line about the swimming pools at the Jewish settlements. Nice work, National Geographic.

Indeed, Auja does dry up every summer. The picture above shows why. A 2,000-foot-deep well doesn't affect topwater. But this does. The blue and white sign reads: Jerusalem Water Undertaking, Ramallah and Al-Bireh District. Well no. 3/ Ein Samia. The water of Ein Samia is captured and transferred – to Ramallah. Ein Samia is the source of the Auja stream that feeds the village Auja. If you guessed that the well is Palestinian, you guessed right.

Story absolves PA of all responsibility

Surrounding the spring are findings of a Roman-Byzantine city with dams, aqueducts and flour mills. Very, very cool. It is also one of the suggested locations of Joshua's battle at the Ai when the Israelites entered Canaan. For future reference National Geographic, you can find it at these co-ordinates: 23166/654998.

Moving on:

"To meet these costs [to buy water from the horrible, thieving Israeli water company] he [an elderly farmer named Muhammad Salama] is selling off his livestock, and his sons have taken jobs at an Israeli settlement, tending the tomatoes, melons and other crops irrigated from the aquifer that is off-limits to Palestinian farmers."

This is more hogwash. We've already seen that the reason Auja is drying up is because of Palestinian water drilling, not Israeli. The Israeli settlements grow mostly tomatoes, grapes, dates and spices. (Melons actually grow further south.) They use water captured from flash floods at the Tirza water reservoir, instead of flowing to the Dead Sea. Water use is optimized via reclaimed water, as well as advanced irrigation and growing technology. Israel leads the world in reclaiming sewage water for agriculture. In fact, some 75 per cent of water from Israeli toilets, dishwashers and shower drains is recycled and used in agriculture.

The aquifer is not off limits to Palestinians. This is a bold lie. Indeed, Palestinians drill and use water from the aquifer routinely, yet it is not controlled or regulated.

In the picture gallery, a photo of an Israeli couple by the shores of the Sea of Galilee is captioned: "Israelis relax by the Sea of Galilee, which is fed by the Jordan River and supplies a third of Israel's fresh water. Since 1967 Israel has blocked Syria's access to the lake's shoreline."

This is cheap demagoguery. Would National Geographic publish a photo of Georgians sitting by the Black Sea with the caption: Georgia has blocked Russia's access to the sea's shoreline since 1992? The sentence is in essence true. Left unchecked, the Syrians would undoubtedly approach the lake and pump its waters to a drying and thirsty Syria. The thing is, they have no business being there, and I'd expect National Geographic to know a little bit more about the borders of the modern Middle East. The fact is, the international border in not on or in the lake. The lake was never part of Syria, and the international border runs up high on the cliff. Between 1948 and 1967, Syria encroached to the water line. It is why they demand to return to the June 4, 1967, lines and not the international border.

There is much, much more. The article is filled with shoddy research and poor journalism. But what bugs me the most is that there are real problems that need to be addressed. To claim that the Palestinians receive their fair share of water is untrue. They don't. But publishing this kind of one-sided, ludicrous depiction of reality that once again absolves the Palestinian Authority of any and all responsibility is simply absurd. It does not promote peace or understanding, only animosity.

Shame on you National Geographic.

What can you do? Write to National Geographic's editors. Tell them what you think. If enough voices are heard, we can hope that National Geographic will become better at fact-checking, so that our children can also have great memories of the yellow mag.

Uri Goldflam has been working in the field of Israel education, leadership training and educational tourism for the past 17 years in various positions in Israel and abroad. He is currently the Director of External Relations and Development for the Society for Protection of Nature in Israel (SPNI).

The Sea of Galilee, some 53 kilometres in circumference, is Israel's largest freshwater lake. The writer of this essay, Uri Goldflam, takes issue with statements by National Geographic in a recent essay about Israel's use of the water in the sea. [Flash90 photo]

'Masa Israel allowed me to develop my career'

By Leila Hesselon

I always wanted to gain professional experience in medical research abroad and thus decided to head to Israel. I had wanted to return there since my Birthright trip. Thus, I enrolled in Masa Israel's Career Israel, a five-month internship program in Tel Aviv.

Having grown up in a small Jewish community in Saskatchewan, I was looking forward to being surrounded by a group of Jewish peers from all over the world. Although Saskatchewan Jews are committed community members, my synagogue's closing ceremony, in my small town of Battleford, Sask., shortly followed my bat mitzvah celebration.

When I next stepped inside the local synagogue, I was in high school and it was one of my classmates' homes. I was fortunate to attend Jewish camp during childhood and once I started McGill University in Montreal, I met people from all over the country who would become lifelong Jewish friends. Since returning to Saskatoon for school, I had become close to the Israeli emissaries, who had encouraged me to spend more time in Israel.

During my five months in Israel, I interned in a genetics lab at Tel Aviv University, whose focus is to understand the molecular basis of hearing loss in Israeli populations, gaining hands-on lab experience that will be crucial in my future career.

Aside from my work, I was able to connect with the other Career Israel interns from all over the world. Sharing apartments in Tel Aviv, we spent hours at the beach, and on our apartment's rooftop, immersed in interesting discussions about Judaism and Israel from diverse perspectives. On weekends, we travelled the country together and throughout the week, we took part in seminars about Israeli society.

As a Jewish person from a remote location, I became fascinated by other Jewish populations found in small communities all over the world. Once I returned from Israel, I developed my Book Compilation Project concept and was fortunate to partner with Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (CHW). Through this initiative, I am collecting stories from Jewish Canadians, both men and women, about their interactions with other Jews from all over the world. My book is a celebration of modern Jewish life.

I am looking for stories in two categories, from either people who have travelled to remote and distant locations and connected with local Jewish populations, or Jewish travellers who have shared a unique experience with other Jewish travellers in remote pockets of the world while, for example, backpacking in South America or trekking in Nepal. I aim to publish a book with 50 such illuminating stories.

All proceeds from the sale of the book will go to CHW, whose mandate is to support a multitude of programs and projects for children, health care and women in Israel and Canada. All stories are due July 1, 2010.

I am thankful for my Masa Israel experience because it not only allowed me to develop my career, but it also gave me the opportunity to learn more about different global Jewish experiences. I look forward to seeing my book project give voice not just to the Canadian Jewish experience, but also to those all over the world.

For more information about my project, see the website: www.chw.ca/ychw/en/page/279. E-mail: leila.hesselson@mail.mcgill.ca. Submit stories to: submissions@chw.ca

Freedom for Gilad

Among the many moral inconsistencies in the worldview of the peace activists who sailed last month on the "Freedom Flotilla" to smash the Israeli blockade of Gaza is the fact that they made no plea, nor have they ever, on behalf of the freedom of Gilad Schalit. Indeed, according to some reports, they even refused to carry a letter from his family to his Hamas jailers. The consciences of the freedom activists are unmoved by the plight of the young man, now 24 years old, kidnapped from his family and people in 2006.

Indeed one of the most glaring inconsistencies in the choppy moral seas in which the flotilla activists sail is their utter lack of unease or qualms of any kind in having dealings at all with Hamas.

Even the Palestinian Authority could offer the flotilla activists some timely instruction concerning the peaceful ways of the Hamas leaders.

The photos on this page are a stark reminder that Schalit remains a kidnapped victim of the leaders of Gaza. Thus, though the flotilla activists are content to assign Schalit to the oblivion of the moral dark space they inhabit, the people of Israel will not.

Nor will we.

The photo from 2006 also shows poignantly and painfully, the images of Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev who were kidnapped by Hezbollah some two weeks after Schalit's kidnapping. They did not return home alive.

The miracles of the Arava

By Keren Segal

In the Arava area of Israel, you can enjoy great peace of mind as you experience the total silence of the desert combined with its beautiful landscape.

During your next visit to Israel, whether on business or pleasure, plan some extra days in the Arava region, a place where true miracles are happening each and every day.

Miracle No. 1: desert agriculture

The Arava, Israel's eastern valley between the Dead Sea and Eilat, is mainly a desert. But one of the amazing aspects of this region is that 90 per cent of its residents are successful farmers. Israeli desert agriculture is the most advanced in the world.

Despite 300 days of burning sun and a dry climate, Arava farmers have taken what nature has dealt them – including saline soil and water – and produced, among other crops, peppers, dates, figs, tomatoes, melons, flowers, grapes and pomelos. Nutrients and precise amounts of water are delivered using computer technology that can even recycle irrigation water. Some of the world's sweetest dates thrive in the Arava. Some say it's because the developing fruit has to "work harder" against the salts of the saline water. The Arava farmers also co-operate with their Jordanian counterparts and teach them the secrets of desert agriculture.

Miracle No. 2: paradise for birders

Israel may be a small country, but if you look up in the sky in the spring and autumn, you will see half a billion migrating birds, more than 230 species, flying on annual migrations between Europe, western Asia and Africa. Israel is also a hot spot for local species. In addition to the transients, more than 270 other species are native to Israel. Altogether, there are 500 species, about the same number as in England and only 150 fewer than in the United States. For bird watching, Kibbutz Lotan, with its bird-watching park, is a Garden of Eden, allowing bird-watchers to view up to 100 varieties within a two-mile radius of the kibbutz.

Miracle No. 3: The Arava Institute

The Arava Institute for Environmental Studies (AIES) is the premier environmental education and research program in the Middle East, preparing future Arab and Jewish leaders to co-operatively solve the region's environmental challenges. Affiliated with Ben-Gurion University, AIES houses academic programs, research, and international co-operation initiatives on a range of environmental concerns and challenges.

A farmer displays melons that he grew in the Arava area.

Students at AIES study a range of environmental issues from a trans-boundary and interdisciplinary perspective while learning peace-building and leadership skills.

New dorms are currently being built based on entirely renewable energy consumption. Here, the idea that nature knows no political borders is more than a belief. It is a fact, a curriculum, and a way of life.

Israel's Silicon Valley of renewable energy

Miracle No. 4: The Silicon Valley of renewable energy

The government of Israel, together with the Arava region's council, decided to take advantage of the region's harsh environmental conditions and transform challenges into opportunities. The Arava region is a perfect hub for the next "hot" worldwide revolution of renewable energy.

The Arava Institute

The Eilat-Eilot Renewable Energy Administration launched the Eilat-Eilot Alternative Energy Project to demonstrate a model for solving the world's energy crisis by engaging and advancing all necessary social sectors and technologies to create an energy-independent region energized by substantial regional commercial development and business opportunities.

The Timna Renewable Energy Park is the physical centrepiece of the region's renewable energy effort, and a government resolution has been passed for the issuing of a tender for the construction of a renewable energy technological centre in the Negev and the Arava.

Following is a list of some of the Eilat-Eilot Alternative Energy Project's activities.

- Setting up renewable energy pilots and giving guidance to renewable energy startups.
- Promoting regulatory and zoning issues in order to enable the setting up of five-megawatt (MW) solar-photovoltaic (PV) farms on different agriculture and industrial lands, primarily the 10 kibbutzim in the region.
- Promoting renewable energy production via solar rooftops and small wind turbines, with an emphasis on 50-kWp (kilowatt at peak) installation on public and private roofs in the region.
- Establishing a top-notch renewable energy research and development department at the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies in Kibbutz Ketura to encourage and co-ordinate the region's many diverse existing R&D activities.
- Working with a national consortium of local energy-saving companies, including the Israel Energy & Security Consortium, to find creative ways to implement energy-saving solutions in regional communities, including hotels in Eilat.
- Writing a renewal-energy educational program for schools, from kindergarten to high school, with the guidance of the Education Ministry.

The Eilat-Eilot Renewable Energy Project marks four years of operation, during which it has merited growing recognition and success.

This summer, you can escape to the Red Sea beaches of Eilat, while enjoying a "one-stop shop" for everything that Israel has to offer in the area of renewable energy innovations. You will also be exposed to many other business opportunities, including in real estate and tourism.

For information about conference and business opportunities in the Arava region, contact the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce at 416-369-6180 or Contact@CanadaIsrael-Chamber.com.

ZAKA expanding Arab units

By AMY KLEIN
JTA

BE'ER SHEVA — At the scene of terrorist attacks, accidents and even homicides, most Israelis are used to the sight of ZAKA volunteers – mostly Orthodox men working to save lives or recover body parts of the dead.

What they may not know is that ZAKA, Israel's Orthodox-run life-saving, rescue and recovery service, also has a minorities unit made up of Bedouin, Muslim and Druze volunteers.

Started about five years ago to serve Israel's non-Jewish communities, primarily Bedouin in the Negev and Druze in the Galilee, the minorities unit is expanding due to its success. Nearly 100 volunteers and three units will be added.

Twenty-six volunteers in two minorities units currently are among ZAKA's 1,500 volunteers, who work in co-ordination with Israeli government agencies on any unnatural death – be it a car accident, terrorist bombing, murder or suicide. Trained as paramedics and in first aid, the volunteers, who are on call 24/7, attempt to revive the victims and, if unsuccessful, respectfully attend to the dead.

The minorities unit also functions when religious Jews cannot, on the Sabbath and holidays. According to Jewish law, Jews may violate the Sabbath to save a life, but not to deal with the dead.

Sheik Jaffal Abu Sabet, who has been leading the Muslim unit in the Negev for the past 13 years, says that, "For us [honouring the dead] is a great honour.

"It gives me faith and pride that they depend on me," Abu Sabet said of the Jews he helps.

"In the end we are all people – Jews, Muslims, Christians – and we all must be taken care of the same way."

In car accidents and terrorist attacks, the police contact families. But for other unnatural deaths, it is ZAKA members who often visit the victim's home to inform the family.

Having volunteers who hail from those communities helps, says David Rose, ZAKA's director of international development.

> According to both Jewish and Muslim law it is important to treat the dead respectfully

"We were often the first on the scene, and the question arose about how to contact the families or deal with the families or treat the dead," Rose said of cases involving Bedouin, Druze and Muslim victims.

Now ZAKA, which started as a haredi organization, plans to increase its Druze, Bedouin and Muslim units to 125 volunteers in five units. ZAKA views its most important task in the minorities unit as dealing with the victims themselves.

"Interestingly, at the first meeting you had Jewish rabbis telling the local imams how we deal with our dead according to Jewish law, and their local religious leaders telling the rabbis how they deal with their dead," Rose said.

According to both Jewish and Muslim law it is important to treat the dead respectfully, whether it be covering the bodies so that others cannot see them or collecting every last body part for burial, including blood.

"In principle, they deal with it the same way," Gadi Kellermann, chief of operations in the Negev, said of Muslim dealings with the dead. "But from an emotional point of view, it's good for Muslim families to know that there are Muslims dealing with the victims from the start."

A man to be watched

A glimpse into the file concerning Theodor Herzl at the police archive in Paris, where he lived for a few years, reveals some interesting scraps of information about the father of Zionism.

By SEFY HENDLER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

It's hard to think of a less appropriate place for an encounter with Theodor Herzl than the French police archive in the heart of Paris' Latin Quarter.

The archive is housed in a massive concrete building, one of the architectural scars left on the City of Lights during the second half of the 20th century.

By contrast, much of the Paris in which Herzl lived, the Paris of the Right Bank, has to a large extent remained unchanged since the end of the 19th century. The Tuileries Gardens where he roamed, rue Monceau where he lived, the courtyard of the Ecole Militaire where Herzl, appalled, observed the humiliation of Alfred Dreyfus – all have maintained much the same appearance that they had around 1900.

The encounter between a 21st-century Israeli journalist and the French police's secret notes on a person who was also a foreign (Austrian) journalist in Paris, occurs under the watchful eyes of the archive directors. It is necessary, of course, to provide both a request and precise details of the files you wish to examine. The Dreyfus files, which are also kept here, fill three huge cartons, whereas Herzl – whose 150th birthday was recently commemorated – gets by with one slim folder.

Theodor Herzl

Judging by the information here, the authorities' interest in him – first evident toward the end of his stint as a full-time journalist – was limited, though not negligible. First to fall out of the folder was a calling card that had hardly yellowed at all: "Dr. Theodor Herzl, Correspondent Neue Freie Presse, 8 rue Monceau" it reads, in fancy embossed letters. On the card Herzl himself apparently scrawled a few notes in hurried handwriting: "Talk to me about this matter ...".

How exactly did this card fall into the hands of an industrious policeman who collected information about the correspondent of the Neue Freie Presse? No one has the answer.

What is known is that Herzl arrived in Paris at the end of 1891 as the correspondent of the Viennese newspaper, then one of the most important papers in Europe. Until 1895 he was a diligent and gifted reporter, who pounded the pavements between the National Assembly, the courts and the theatres. Some of his reports are masterpieces of journalistic writing, in the spirit of those times. Furthermore, these were the years in which Herzl began to shape the Zionist idea, upon which he would elaborate in his book The Jewish State, in 1896.

In the foreword to the three fascinating volumes of Herzl's journalistic writing, published by the Zionist Library, biographer Alex Bein writes (in Hebrew): "The years Herzl spent in Paris were without a doubt the most important years of learning and personal development in his life. At their start, Herzl, the writer and human being, was appalled to the point of despair; at their conclusion Herzl was confident in himself and in his power to bring about a revolution in Judaism."

The French Republic was rocked at that time by political upheaval, economic scandals and anarchist terror. One of the major causes of tumult then was the false conviction of the Jewish army officer Alfred Dreyfus of spying for Germany. On Jan. 5, 1895, Herzl, as a newspaper correspondent, witnessed first-hand Dreyfus being stripped of his rank as army captain after his conviction in a closed trial, and the cries of "Death to the Jews" from spectators who witnessed the ceremony. However, the folder at the police archive in Paris does not reveal even a trace about the Jewish journalist's responses to this drama.

The first document with a notation concerning the correspondent for the Austrian newspaper is dated Jan. 20, 1893, a little over a year after Herzl took up residence in the French capital. The document, called "Note 1,617" comes from the bureau of the chief of the Paris police and is addressed to "M. the Officer in the Investigations Department," who is asked urgently to provide "all the information he can obtain" about Herzl.

The French police, at least in those years, and at least in the case of Herzl, apparently worked fast. Within a few weeks, on Feb. 25, a report was submitted to the police chief, stating: "Monsieur Herzl (Theodor), correspondent of the Neue Freie Presse of Vienna. He is married and the father of two children. He arrived in Paris in October 1891, claims to be from Bordeaux, and lived at 4 rue Daunou until May 1892. Since then he has been living with his family at 8 rue Monceau, in an apartment with an annual rent of 6,000 francs."

'This foreign citizen belongs to the Jewish faith'

This was a substantial sum in those years, nearly four times the annual wage of a typical skilled worker. The officer who conducted the investigation, whose name is signed in an illegible scrawl at the end of the report, adds that Herzl also keeps "four servants and it appears he enjoys many [financial] resources.

"We have learned that a while ago Herzl declared one evening, upon his return home, that he had paid more than 100 francs to send telegrams to the newspaper for which he writes, concerning a debate held in the legislature."

The resourceful and anonymous detective offers more scraps of information about the newspaper itself and then returns to his main task: providing information about the man in question. He writes: "Herzl is hardly known in the quarter where he resides and few visitors come to his home. However, he receives large quantities of mail. This foreign citizen belongs to the Jewish faith. Sometimes he gets into small arguments with members of his family, who are very miserly. According to what they [apparently, the neighbours] say, the family scolds him for being too extravagant."

Theodor Herzl looking at the Rhine River from his hotel room in Basel, 1897.

These comments of course reflect the problems of Herzl's marriage to his wife, Julie. It was important to him to establish a joint household in which not only he, his wife and children lived, but also his own parents, who came from Vienna at his request. The dry tone of the report does not shed much light on these subjects, and the investigator ends with two conclusions: "It is not known whether [Herzl] harbors hostile feelings toward France," he writes, adding: "He has not fulfilled his obligations under the order of Oct. 2, 1888, concerning foreigners residing in France."

This brief remark concerning Herzl's apparent failure to register as a foreigner, in violation of the residence regulations in France, was grist for the law-enforcement mill in France in the next two years. Already by Feb. 27, 1893, police officers were consulting about how to deal with Herzl and handing this lukewarm potato over to their colleagues in the quarter where the reporter lived, the prestigious Faubourg Saint-Honore. According to another document, filed the following year, it appears Herzl was fined and the residence case ended with a whimper.

In early 1895, according to the archive file, the police again took an interest in the correspondent, who had meanwhile acquired considerable professional prestige. A letter Herzl received in February from a reader in Graz, complimenting him for his "genuine talent," was intercepted by French investigators. Even though in this case, too, it turned out the investigators had not come up with especially sensitive information, the translation of the letter into French was filed away in the folder.

At the same time, one of the people in charge of the police investigations department filed yet another report on Herzl, stating that he had brown hair and beard. As to Herzl's "reputation in terms of morality and integrity," the inspector formally declares, in ornate cursive letters, that he was held in "good" regard.

Despite their meager, not to say disappointing, findings up until this point, the people responsible for the file were apparently on the alert and ready for any development. One arose at the end of 1895, when Herzl left Paris and resettled in Vienna, as his newspaper's literary editor. Thus, on Nov. 24, another brief notation is added to his French file: "Herzl has left Paris permanently. He has been replaced as the Neue Freie Presse correspondent by Dr. Fischbauer."

At this point, the Paris police detectives apparently suspended their work, though they did not close the file on Herzl. That happened only on July 4, 1904, the day after Herzl's death. An industrious and alert clerk at Paris police headquarters added a six-line newspaper clipping to the file that day: "Monsieur Herzl, a well-known and reputed author and publicist, head of the Zionist movement, has passed away near Vienna at the age of 44."

"Deceased" was thereupon stamped on the binding of the folder and adorns it to this day. Case closed.

Every visit to Israel is a form of self-discovery. Most people who have been there will confirm this. A visit to this tiny, remarkable land tends to be memorable for both the veteran and the novice traveller.

As a frequent visitor to Israel, I can confirm this.

On a recent trip there, I discovered how overwhelmingly enjoyable and remarkably serene an experience it is to be a guest at a luxury hotel.

In fact, The CJN was invited to be a guest at two stunningly luxurious hotels. In the result, therefore, the discovery – and the feelings of enjoyment and serenity, of course – were double.

As with all visits to Israel, I was prepared to feel the familiar, broad rush of radiating happiness that happens simply from being there. But I was not quite prepared to feel, as well, the exceptionally calming tranquillity of our all-too-brief stays in the Mamilla Hotel in Jerusalem and Mitzpe Hayamim in the Galilee.

This is a tale of two luxuries.

• • •

An overnight stay in the Mamilla Hotel, in its essence, is an esthetic experience as much as it is a hotel one.

Esthetics – as both form and substance, means and ends – is the governing ethos of the Mamilla Hotel. Every aspect of the guest's experience in the hotel is an encounter with tasteful elegance.

The architecture and interior design of the hotel are the combined product of internationally renowned architects Moshe Safdie and Piero Lissoni. Safdie has created a downtown structure of Jerusalem stone that attaches naturally and historically to the neighbourhood merely metres from the storied walls of the Old City.

Tribute to Israel

A feeling of total belonging and internal balance sets in

Lissoni's interiors emphasize quiet and evoke calm. The interactions between the details of the hotel's furnishings, decorative appointments and finishings and the hotel's guests' experience are aimed at achieving a spa-like feeling of serenity wherever one sits in the spacious building.

Low-volume music wafts in the hallways. The lighting is always softly muted and the colours throughout the hotel on walls, floors and ceilings and design accents are the colours of Jerusalem's stones and the beiges, creams, oranges and browns of the desert so close by.

Jerusalem, of course, is the hotel's crowning esthetic. It's also the physical context that gives the hotel its very name and the emotional context that gives a stay at the Mamilla a sense of purposeful occasion. The hotel's doors open onto a tiny stairway that takes the guest to the Alrov Mamilla Avenue, the new pedestrian mall lined by coffee shops and upscale stores that connects the hotel to the Jaffa Gate. It is a bridge from the new to the old and, of course, from the Old City to the New City.

But it is more than that, too. It is a hope for the future coexistence of two peoples.

Inside the hotel, thoughtful, good-natured, helpful, solicitous service is the hallmark of the staff. They refer to themselves as hosts.

Jerusalem's newest hotel, the Mamilla has 194 guest rooms of five different varieties. The Lissoni appointments ensure a minimalist, contemporary approach to design and decoration, and are a superbly rich experience in function, comfort and delight.

One of the innovative and quite interesting features of the rooms is the fact that the glass walls that separate the bathroom from the bedroom are made of special light-conducting crystals that allow the walls to become opaque or transparent.

The culinary experience in the various restaurants and dining halls in the hotel were unsurpassingly high. Typically, each meal offered a cornucopia of quantity, quality, variety and vast offerings of selection. For example, the salads, of which there were always more than a dozen different kinds at each meal, were a nutritionist's aspiration. Main courses were a gourmet's delight. And the desserts were a gourmand's seduction.

In the very heart of Jerusalem where old and new blend, the Mamilla guest, with coffee in hand, can look from the hotel rooftop upon this most precious space on earth and marvel at the exceptionally good turn of events that have brought him to this magical vista. The coffee is excellent. And the view breathes life, spirit and hope into the soul of the visitor.

Some 135 kilometres to the north, on the road up the mountain almost halfway between Rosh Pina and Tzfat in the lushly green and fertile hills of the Galilee, is Hotel Mitzpe Hayamim. (The name translates somewhat roughly in English as The Lookout upon the Lakes Hotel.)

The word "mitzpe" (lookout) is part of the name because of the relatively high elevation of the place, some 570 metres above sea level.

The reason for the word "yamim" (lakes) is because from any balcony of the hotel, after the mist of the morning lifts, one can see the Sea of Galilee hard to the south and the Hula Valley gently to the north.

The word "hotel" in the name hardly captures the essence of the establishment. For hotel is merely the beginning, the introduction, so to speak, of the essential threefold nature of Mitzpe Hayamim. To be sure, the place is a hotel. But it is also a spa and an organic farm. All three components are integrated seamlessly into one enveloping holistic experience of sun, earth, touch, smell, taste and quiet.

The hotel is a member of the Relais & Chateaux Association that affirms Mitzpe Hayamim conforms to and achieves the association's high-standard "5c" philosophy: character, charm, cuisine, calm and courtesy.

The hotel's organic gardens and farm comprise 28 acres. It is the source of the fruit, vegetables, spices, herbs, eggs and dairy products that find their way into the the hotel's two restaurants, one of which is vegetarian, neither of which, however, is under kosher supervision.

One of the rooms in the Mamilla Hotel

The view from a balcony at Mitzpe Hayamim

Bread, jams, chocolates, cheeses are prepared on the premises by expert chefs. Experienced horticulturalists and farmers tend to the farm. It operates as a self-sufficient unit and is worked according to biblical methods, which we were told is also known as Demeter agriculture.

The hotel is situated on a promontory that is breathtaking. One touches the hills and the gardens and feels the view, the air and even the water.

The sheer beauty of the Mitzpe promontory and the sense of close-at-hand calm that it evokes flow through all the activities and guests' services at the hotel, including the spa, the studios and artists' galleries.

It is not long after one sets down one's luggage, settles into the room, absorbs the magnificent view, reflects on the geography, eats, drinks, walks, reads, swims, sits, or simply "does" nothing that a feeling of total belonging, internal balance and, one might say, harmony sets in.

It is a very good, restorative feeling.

Israel – the land, the country and the people – offers the visitor experiences that can stir the soul or tingle the senses, inform the mind or challenge the body, inspire the heart or calm concerns.

At the Mamilla Hotel in Jerusalem and Mitzpe Hayamim Hotel in the Galilee, this visitor experienced them all.

A conversation with Aharon Appelfeld

The Israel Prize-winning novelist speaks with Ha'aretz on the occasion of the English-language publication of Blooms of Darkness.

By DAVID B. GREEN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

When he speaks, it's in a voice hardly louder than a whisper, and his words are measured and calm. The way Aharon Appelfeld writes, too, is neither showy nor provocative. Yet the 78-year-old author describes situations that are almost inconceivable, and behaviour that can be unconscionable – situations in many cases derived from experiences that he underwent as a child in Nazi-occupied Europe. In more than three dozen books, Appelfeld, who was born in the Romanian town of Czernowitz (today in Ukraine) in 1932, has used his memories of life from ages eight to 13 to create a literature that explores the range of the human soul, in which his characters are subject to extreme conditions and respond in ways that are often horrifying, but can also be surprisingly graceful and courageous.

Aharon Appelfeld

Blooms of Darkness is Appelfeld's latest novel to be published in English (translated by Jeffrey M. Green, Schocken Books, 288 pages). Published in Hebrew in 2006, the book tells the story of Hugo, an 11-year-old boy whose mother deposits him in the hands of her gentile childhood friend Mariana, after the Germans begin deporting the Jews in their area to concentration camps. Mariana lives in a brothel, where she spends nights working as a prostitute, and Hugo, whose life is now circumscribed by the three walls and door of her closet, witnesses what Mariana goes through with his ears. In his 1997 memoir, Story of a Life, Appelfeld described how he worked as an assistant to an abusive prostitute named Maria after escaping, at age 10, from a concentration camp in Ukraine. That was just one of the ways that he survived during his time on the run, which ended when he joined the Russian army as a kitchen boy. In the case of Hugo, however, Mariana watches over him until the threat to the Jews passes, and both she and her colleagues at the brothel are presented as largely pious and brave.

After the war, Appelfeld spent several months in a DP camp in Italy before immigrating to Palestine in 1946. It was only in the 1950s that he discovered that his father had survived the war, too, and was living in Israel. Appelfeld's mother was killed shortly after the Germans occupied their town. Having completed only first grade as a child, he didn't receive a formal education until after coming to Israel, but he eventually complemented his career as a writer by teaching literature at Ben-Gurion University in Be'er Sheva.

Appelfeld spoke with Ha'aretz at his home in Mevasseret Zion, outside Jerusalem.

H: You had a very similar experience to Hugo. Is this something you had wanted to write about for a long time?

A: All of my books are autobiographical in one way or another. But I don't write chronological autobiography, in the way that it happened...

H: No, not even in your memoir?

A: Not even in my memoir. I write fiction. But I believe that all fiction that lacks a strong foundation in autobiography will be science fiction. What I tell about is myself.

H: Just as you can't write fiction without being autobiographical, am I right in thinking that you couldn't write a standard autobiography of yourself, even if you wanted to?

A: Correct, and the reason is simple. My big experiences took place during the years 1939 to 1945, from age seven to about age 13. What does a man remember from age seven or eight? My education didn't go beyond first grade. I didn't learn history. Of course I remember things from age seven, eight or nine, but they're basically sensory memories, not intellectual ones. Because how much history did I know? Nothing.

H: How do you work? Do you map out your books before you write them? Or do the books write themselves, as it were?

A: To say that they "write themselves" would be an exaggeration. But they are also not planned. I need to listen to myself for a lot of time. A great deal of my memory is in my body, in my senses, not my mind. What I mean is that much of what I experienced in these years is in my body – in my legs, my arms, my hair, in my ears – and that's an important source. Say I feel dampness in the rain, that takes me to those same days. On cold days, I'm back in those days, back in the war.

Experience That Talks -- Solutions That Work

'I would not exchange my life for another one'

H: You also write often about your dreams, in both your memoir and your fiction. My sense is that for you as a writer, the line between dreams and reality is ambiguous.

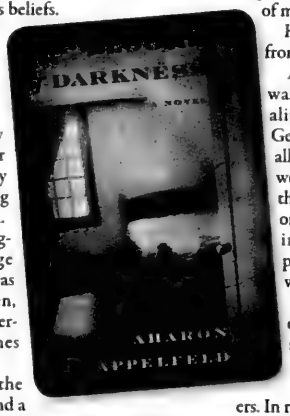
A: Yes, definitely. Because, when we say dreams, we are talking about the subconscious. The dream is largely a part of the subconscious that is visible to us.

H: At the same time, I don't think you attribute a supernatural meaning to dreams. When Hugo dreams that he is talking with his mother, she's not coming back from the dead to talk with him. It's all taking place within his mind, correct?

A: There's nothing mystical going on here. I don't deal with the mystical. That doesn't mean that even what we call a "rational" man can't have all kinds of experiences in his life, including irrational ones.

H: When the book ends, Hugo's postwar life is just beginning. So I'm wondering: do you have high hopes for Hugo? Do you see his future being similar to yours?

A: Look, he took in a lot, a lot of darkness, a lot of things that he didn't understand at all. He's sensitive, to his own soul and to that of Mariana. He spent time in the brothel, and he heard things he didn't hear at home, about religious beliefs. There's a lot of prayer there, and requests for forgiveness, even though it's supposed to be a "house of sin."



H: You are certainly not judgmental of your characters. In many senses, there is something holy about these women.

A: No, I'm not judgmental. I don't judge people. But I think it has to be said: these women, who are seen as an "underworld," they're the ones who saved Hugo.

H: During most of the story, for about a year and a half, Hugo is living in a closet, and can only partially take in what is going on. Did you mean the closet in a metaphorical sense?

A: No, the closet is not a metaphor, it's life. He's hungry, he's thirsty for love. A lot surrounds him, and he doesn't understand it. But he has sharp senses. And what he doesn't understand, he has to guess about.

H: Have you ever felt that you have exhausted this subject or period – the period of the Holocaust – or that you might want to write about another period of your life?

A: I write about ideas. It's not memoir, it's not history, it's not psychology, it's about the human being in the world, all of the good and the bad that a person encounters in life. This is what I have written 40 books about. I have written books that take place in Israel, and I have written about other periods, not just about the period of the war. Also about other times in Jewish history. I don't write history, or memoirs of the Holocaust. Of course, in the Holocaust, many horrible things happened. So many "interesting" things. Take the case of a boy living with a prostitute. This doesn't happen every day. And if I myself hadn't lived with a prostitute, I couldn't have written the book. Things like this couldn't have happened in regular times.

H: If it were within your power to exchange your life for one in which you did not go through the Holocaust, would you?

A: With all the tragedy, I would not exchange my life for another one. It's part of me. I felt this as a child, already back then.

H: You haven't written about your father. But he survived the war, no?

A: I found my father after many years. He arrived here after the war. We had come to the [concentration] camp together, but we were separated. He was sent to do labour and I escaped. After this, the Russian army liberated the camp, and he was drafted into the Red Army. Then, after the war, he was sent to Russia. He came to Israel only in the 1950s. He helped me to reconstruct much of my memories.

H: How did you escape from the camp?

A: I escaped in 1941. It was before the "industrialization" of death. The Germans brought people to all kinds of camps. There were fences, of course, but they weren't as well-sealed or -protected. So I escaped into the forest. There people from the underworld adopted me.

H: What sort of underworld? Do you mean smugglers?

A: Not just smugglers. Robbers, murderers. In regular civilian life, there is some kind of order. In that world, there was no order. The Russian army came. I saw that it was good. I was 12 (it was 1944). I joined the army as a kitchen boy, and I spent nearly a year with the Russian Army. That too was an important school for me.

H: You must be asked to speak out on political topics, no? Why do you seem to avoid that?

A: I try not to be involved in political life. It's a one-sided way of looking at things. You take a particular stand and you stick to that position. When you encounter an opposing position, you tell yourself not to pay attention. You teach yourself to be a one-sided person. This is very strong in Israel. You identify yourself as "secular," and you don't see there's an interesting life going on among religious people. You demonize the religious person. I don't say that religious people are perfect. But there's no need to demonize them.

> 'I know what a catastrophe is, and what isn't'

H: But you seem to identify as a secular Jew, no?

A: I see myself as a Jew. I'm secular but also religious. My grandparents were religious, and I'm just like them. I had uncles who were Communists, and I'm just like them. I have written about Jews who were in mixed marriages, and I'm just like them.

H: It sounds like you don't go into a panic about every political development, that you take the long view. Does this make it easier to be optimistic, or at least less pessimistic?

A: Yes, I'm more optimistic. I've seen a lot. I know what a catastrophe is, and what isn't. If Iran declares that Israel has to be destroyed, that rings a bell for me. That's been said before. I'm not saying that it's the same thing. But it's being said every week. And if we forget that we heard it, he says it again.

H: So that might constitute a potential catastrophe?

A: I should say so. If I'm asked to write about the need for the Americans to impose sanctions on Iran, I will say yes to that. That's something essential.

Weaving memory and environment Canadian-Israeli artist turns heads

By STEVEN KLEIN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Melanie Daniel

Melanie Daniel's unlikely path from Canadian science student to Tel Aviv artist started with a chance encounter in India, culminated with the 2009 Rappaport Prize for Young Israeli Painter, and now a new show at the Tel Aviv Museum of Art.

"Had I stayed in Canada I'm not sure I would have followed the arts, and definitely not in the capacity that I am today," said Daniel.

Evergreen, her exhibit at the museum, "reveals the culmination of the artist's interest in how people assimilate and camouflage themselves in their environments, combining a sense of strangeness with a sense of belonging," according to Sagi Refael, the show's curator.

"I needed to be removed from that environment in order to reference it," says Daniel. But none of this could have happened without first crossing paths with her future husband, Yair Harel. A year after meeting him in the subcontinent, she moved in 1995 to Jerusalem to give their blossoming long-distance relationship a try, she recalled last week at her home in the Ajami neighbourhood of Jaffa.

"I just upped and left and said it's now or never," she said, noting she was a semester shy of graduating college.

"If I don't go to Israel and see if I can make a life with this man I won't do it at all."

She says that growing up in Kelowna – some 250 miles east of Vancouver – she had never dreamed of moving to Israel, but then again, "a lot of my decisions have been that way, from a visceral, gut level." The couple married 15 years ago. She and Yair, a fiction and screenplay writer, have a baby son, Ido.

She says she started college at the University of British Columbia thinking she would be a doctor, and did not take her first fine arts class until she transferred to Concordia University in Montreal.

Although Daniel, who mostly focuses on painting landscapes, displayed artistic tendencies, she says it never occurred to her before arriving in Israel "to go full throttle to pursue a career in art."

Fifteen years later, Daniel became the first native English speaker to claim the Rappaport Prize, which was established in 2006 and goes each year to one young and one established Israeli artist. She says the award has been a huge boost for her, in terms of exposure, critical success and the value of her works.

Daniel says she plunged into the arts when she applied to the Bezalel Academy of Arts and Design, in part because back in 1995 she didn't really know anyone beyond her husband's family and a few other friends.

"I knew I would need my own corner, my own world to maintain my sanity," she recalls. She was accepted into the program, where she was the only native English speaker in her class. After obtaining both a bachelor's and master's of fine arts in 2006, she began exhibiting her works in galleries here and abroad while residing in Jerusalem, Herzliya and most recently Jaffa.

The artist's grandmother sweeps snow off a car in this painting.

Nahum Tevet, the head of the master's program at Bezalel, says Daniel's development as a student was remarkable.

"She came out as a completely surprising, unexpected and different artist, and she is an example of what can happen if you are really devoted to your work and open to changing your image of yourself." He adds that the influence of the immigration experience on Daniel reminds him of a couple of Russian students who also attended the program.

A rare symbiosis between Agnon and Arikha

An exhibition of Avigdor Arikha's drawings for a story by S. Y. Agnon shows how the artist's greatness was there from the start.

By ARIEL HIRSCHFELD
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

"Kelev Hutzot" ("A Stray Dog") by Shmuel Yosef (S.Y.) Agnon, with illustrations by Avigdor Arikha, published by Tarshish Books in 1960, is one of the most beautiful Hebrew books ever issued in Israel. The first volume of Agnon's collected stories (Schocken Press, Berlin, 1934) was a masterpiece of design, in which every detail of material and form provides a unique lesson in the creation of a modern Hebrew book of high quality that can face the design challenges of the world around it.

Avigdor Arikha self-portrait

Israeli publishers, including Schocken Press, have hardly ever lived up to the standard presented by that edition. And the later editions of Agnon's writings – those published while he was still alive and particularly those that came out after his death – continued the downward trend. The latest, softcover version presents a most amateurish and pathetic design that drags the writings down with every possible conceptual error and superficial stereotype.

Moshe Spitzer's Tarshish Books, founded in Jerusalem in 1939, is the famous exception to this rule, and not by chance: Spitzer was a gifted designer and the director of Schocken Press in Germany, and one of those behind the first Agnon edition. Spitzer is also responsible for several Hebrew fonts used in contemporary printing and also wrote some of the most interesting Hebrew texts on this subject. The books he published remain treasures of design, familiar to all book lovers in these parts.

A Stray Dog (a story from Agnon's Only Yesterday) is one of a series of books illustrated by Arikha and released by various publishers. The loveliest of all were published by Tarshish. (Arikha's splendid drawings for Chaim Nachman Bialik's Safiah, which are just as impressive as the drawings for A Stray Dog, were given a very disappointing printing by the Bialik Publishing House. It was not that sharp to begin with and has faded over the years. The Tarshish printing remains just as sharp and alive as ever.)

A Stray Dog is a notable achievement by any measure. In addition to the formal quality of the book, it achieves a rare symbiosis between Agnon's writing and Arikha's drawings. Not everyone was aware of it at the time, when Arikha was in his mid-20s, that here was a unique master artist who would become one of the world's great painters of his generation.

Agnon's writing is resistant to illustration. Even when thoroughly realistic, the words contain so many levels of perception and such a multitude of points of view that no visual medium could possibly match it, all the more so when his writing abandons the realistic mode and takes flight into the realms of imagination and horror. Attempts to attach illustrations to Agnon stories have mostly led to a "Jewish" style that is farther, perhaps, from the Agnon world than any other. The Jewishness of the Agnon stories is so deep and complex that the "Jewish" images added to them, limited and superficial to begin with, appeared crude and sentimental and, above all, superfluous.

Arikha's drawings draw all their power from the line. Even someone with no real knowledge of the art of drawing will discern in Arikha's Tmol Shilshom works the vast difference between an ordinary line that someone scribbled or sketched and the tense, charged, living line in these drawings. Arikha was a truly great master of line, and a master of drawing who belongs in the same ranks as Raphael and Picasso. Arikha's marvellous drawing ability is the real power contained in his art. This is where the great drama occurs of the living touch between him and his instrument of choice (pencil, pen, coal, brush), which for him is the main conduit to "the world."

Avigdor Arikha

Arikha's life as an artist is arrayed as a triptych, from his start in Jerusalem as he grew to adulthood and grappled with the idea of the "abstract" art of modernist painting. The second chapter is the "abstract" chapter, and the third began in the mid-1960s, when he turned his back on the abstract and on modernism as a whole, and returned to drawing "from nature." A serious interpretation of this progression would require a very long essay, but here, too, one must note that Arikha's artistic drama takes place against the history of western painting as a whole, and not necessarily of Israeli painting. It's not only a matter of the narrow outlook of Israeli painting in the latter half of the 20th century, with its tyranny of one type of modernism, and the intellectual domination of all of Israeli art criticism by a small minority who could not understand – nor, it goes without saying, accept – such a rejection of modernism and such scathing criticism of its mindset, but of the deep affinity that Arikha harboured for the figures he encountered in the museums of Paris – Uccello, Poussin, Velazquez.

This powerful bond with the great artists of the past was not a postmodernist message, but an undermining of the very idea of progress: the advancement of the notion of the timelessness of culture and art. Line, the very essence of the art of drawing, is the profound point of connection between the abstract aspect of a painting and the concrete, which requires an image. It's the power that leads to the abstract and also what obliged Arikha to abandon it. In one of my conversations with Arikha, here in Jerusalem, he talked about the moral obligation toward that which is visible. Reality is not something that can be ignored, he said.

The line in the drawings of A Stray Dog is taut with the power that lies between the concrete and the abstract. In those years, Arikha was in a process of discovering the power of the abstract as it pertained to him. To him, abstract forms and lines were akin to drawings of energy – invisible gusts of wind within the drawn space. This tension is wherein lies the oh-so-rare point of connection between Agnon's style of writing and Arikha's art at that young stage, when it was fuelled by a passion for the abstract.

Arikha developed a lot in his art, and still the young Arikha's drawings are no less developed than the drawings of the older Arikha who left the realms of the abstract to return to nature. This kind of development belongs to the world of art alone, and not the world of technology. The early stage is not limited, it is the first budding of what will later blossom from it. The sense that the line depicting Balak the dog, or the crowds of Mea She'arim, is powerfully strong fibre infused with tremendous excitement that barely delineates and holds back a roiling inner world is the connection between it and the story of this dog, which appears before you in the simplest fashion as a stray dog, and at the same time is a riddle of destruction that will tantalize readers for as long as they continue to read books.

Kelev Hutzot, an exhibition of drawings by Avigdor Arikha for Agnon's story A Stray Dog, opened recently at the Shai Agnon House, Jerusalem, curated by Mordechai Omer.

Her works are 'anti-nostalgic'

Daniel says that even if she had become a painter but had stayed in Canada, "I don't believe that I would be painting my family." But since she left, her immediate family, young and old, comes up in a number of her works currently displayed at the Tel Aviv Museum of Art – around and on top of a birthday cake in one scene.

The palette of colors at the exhibit predominantly comes from Canada, she says, with sombre purples and greens. Although one might think the images evoke comforting memories from the old country, such as a painting of her grandmother sweeping snow off a car, Daniel insists her works are "anti-nostalgic," stressing they are "completely not sentimental."

Another influence on her current exhibit – open through June 12 – was the arrival of Ido 16 months ago. Whereas she says she used to go to her studio and paint like a nine-to-five job, motherhood has forced her to "steal moments" whenever possible, even after midnight if necessary.

One of her favourite works in the current show is Peacock – a self-portrait with Ido, alongside a body of water. "It was the painting I struggled with the most; one which I nearly scrapped after periodically returning to it during several months," she explains.

"It was so visually dense and demanding, that I could never stay in the room with it for longer than a few hours at a time before my eyes and brain started burning."

She says at one point she cut it in half and saved the left side, plugging away until it finally worked for her.

Motherhood also brought out certain anxieties, which are reflected in her exhibition. "I am a sunny person by nature, but I carry with me very dark thoughts constantly, and this came to a peak when my son was born," she explains. "I became a very fearful person, and poignantly afraid of the world and this definitely had an impact on this particular series."

Some of those anxieties reach back to her first year in Israel. "The idea that life is vulnerable was sharpened after I landed here in the middle of a great big mess. Rabin was assassinated, the [second] intifadah broke out, and my world just became absurd," she says. "I think everyone has been scarred."

Montreal rabbi urges Canadian role investigating Venezuelan anti-Semitism

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Rabbi Adam Scheier of Montreal is asking Canada to use its influence to have an outside investigation launched into two violent incidents at synagogues in Venezuela last year, which, he said, signal a deteriorating situation for Jews in that country.

In a chilling testimony before the House of Commons standing foreign affairs committee June 10, Rabbi Scheier, spiritual leader of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, said the events have terrified the country's Jewish community and that many are fleeing. He alleged that they may be part of a government campaign to intimidate supporters of Israel.

He accused Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez of creating "an environment of fear and terror" for Jews and making anti-Semitism official policy. If his government is not behind the attacks, it is at least inciting them, he suggested.

"There is an unspoken consensus in the [Venezuelan Jewish] community that the Chavez government is the only body in the country that possesses the means, the co-ordination and the distorted political desire to carry out such an attack," Rabbi Scheier told the subcommittee on international human rights.

"In January of 2009, in the early morning hours of the Jewish Sabbath, 15 unidentified men broke into the Tiferet Israel Synagogue in Caracas. They destroyed offices, wrote threatening messages on the synagogue's interior walls and desecrated holy objects.

"One month later, in February, a bomb was thrown into the Beit Samuel Synagogue, damaging property, and sending a threatening message to the Jewish community,"

Those messages echo the anti-Israel language Chavez uses in his speeches, he said.

CIC offers Israel trip to NDP's Layton

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

It might be an offer he can't refuse.

Late last week, NDP Leader Jack Layton held discussions with Canada-Israel Committee CEO Shimon Fogel on the possibility of visiting Israel on a CIC-facilitated trip for the NDP's caucus and various party members.

It would be Layton's first visit to Israel.

The talk between the two men came after comments by deputy NDP leader Libby Davies at a June 5 anti-Israel rally in Vancouver, in which she said Israel's occupation of Palestine began in 1948.

Davies' remarks led to ongoing calls on Layton during question period in the House of Commons to either kick her out of the NDP caucus or replace her as deputy leader. The situation has also created some discord within the party, with the NDP MP for Outremont, Thomas Mulcair, criticizing his colleague for "grossly unacceptable" remarks.

Fogel told The CJN late last week that he was "very encouraged" by Layton's response to the trip proposal, which would allow the party leader to assemble a delegation of his choosing.

An invitation was also extended to Davies through Layton, Fogel added.

"It would be a dedicated NDP trip that would provide them with exposure to, and engagement of, the multiple stakeholders in the questions of the day," Fogel said.

There's no set date for the trip, and the invitation is open-ended.

Fogel said he's now waiting to hear back from Layton, who indicated that he needed to give "logistical considerations" to the trip.

CJN wins Rockower Award

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. — At the 2010 American Jewish Press Association annual meeting here last week, CJN staff reporter Paul Lungen won a Simon Rockower Award for excellence in news reporting for newspapers over 15,000 circulation and all magazine/websites. Lungen won for his story "Israeli rabbi rejects Toronto conversion" (Feb. 9, 2009), about an Israeli rabbinic court's ruling that the conversion 29 years ago of Yossi Fackenheim, son of renowned Holocaust survivor and philosopher Emile Fackenheim, was no longer valid.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Canadians Ordained

NEW YORK — Two Canadians received their rabbinic ordinations and one received his cantorial diploma in recent graduation ceremonies at the Conservative movement's flagship Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. Lori Kauffman of Vancouver and Lara Tav of Toronto were ordained by JTS' rabbinical school, while Toronto's Jeremy Burko received his chazzan diploma from the H.L. Miller Cantorial School and College of Music.

QuAIA Marches

EDMONTON — The group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) marched June 12 in Edmonton's Pride Parade after receiving permission from organizers to do so. A local chapter of the group was formed May 31 in solidarity with the original Toronto branch after the raid by Israeli naval forces on a Turkish supply convoy headed for Gaza that left nine Turks dead. Pride Toronto banned the group from marching under a QuAIA banner, as it had in the past, after complaints from Jewish organizations and Jewish gay and lesbian groups. QuAIA says it will march in the July 4 Toronto parade as part of a coalition dedicated to free speech. QuAIA's participation in the Edmonton parade "took place from start to finish without incident," local member Rob Butz told the gay and lesbian newspaper Xtra! "Our experience in Edmonton reflects Pride's capacity to embrace difference."

WORLD

Directors Briefed

WASHINGTON D.C. — The U.S. Jewish security coordination network briefed summer camp directors on safety last week. SCAN, or the Security Community Network, hosted a conference call June 16 with experts on camp security, including a senior official from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security. "Recent reports of homegrown terrorist activity and arrests coupled with the current tensions in the Middle East" were cited in a statement as reasons for the call.

Jews Harassed

VIENNA — Jews in Vienna reportedly have been facing almost daily harassment since Israel's deadly interception of a Gaza-bound flotilla on May 31. Ariel Muzicant, president of the city's Jewish community, told Austria's public broadcaster that Jews have faced verbal abuse and spitting. He said the violence has been directed at people who are identifiably Jewish, but there's been no physical violence. He said his group has filed lawsuits against organizers of recent anti-Israel protests, since anti-Semitic slogans and images were used. The protesters were mostly of Turkish or Arab origin.

Envoy To Be Ousted

DUBLIN — Ireland will expel an Israeli diplomat over the use of fake Irish passports in the assassination of a senior Hamas official in Dubai. An unnamed Israeli staff member at the Dublin Embassy will be expelled, Ireland's Foreign Ministry said June 15, after an investigation showed that eight Irish passports used in the January assassination of Mahmoud al-Mabhouh were forgeries. Britain and Australia also expelled Israeli diplomats after probes implicated Israel's Mossad intelligence agency in the killing. Assassins used forged British, Irish, French, German and Australian passports to enter Dubai. Israel has neither confirmed nor denied it was involved.

French Court Says al-Dura Film Was Biased

PARIS —A French court found that a French documentary about coverage of the controversial death of a Palestinian boy was defamatory and not objective.

The court found June 10 that the documentary by the private French television channel Canal + about the Mohammed al-Dura case did not use available information to make the documentary more balanced and accurate.

The film aired a month before a verdict in the original lawsuit filed by media watchdog Phillipe Karsenty against France 2 television, which aired the original footage of al-Dura, 12, reportedly killed in the crossfire between Israeli and Palestinian forces in September 2000 in Gaza.

The incident came on one of the first days of the second intifadahs and inflamed tensions. Israel was blamed for the death and took responsibility but later recanted.

France 2 sued Karsenty, a French media watchdog, for libel for claiming the footage was falsified, but a Paris appeals court overturned a ruling against him in 2008.

The original France 2 report said al-Dura was killed by Israeli gunfire, but a probe by Israel and footage showing him lifting his head and opening his eyes after being pronounced dead raised huge doubts about its validity.

NDP MP says Palestine 'occupied' since 1948

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

NDP deputy leader Libby Davies faced calls for her resignation last week after she told a blogger she believed Israel has been occupying Palestine since 1948, the year of Israel's independence.

Davies conducted the video interview with David Katz – editor of the CommentsFromLeftField.com blog – after speaking at an anti-Israel rally in downtown Vancouver on June 5.

In the interview, given just after speaking at the rally, Davies said she believed the occupation of Palestine began in 1948, in response to Katz's question of whether she thought the occupation began in 1948 or 1967.

"It's the longest occupation in the world," she said, adding that she supports calls for boycott, divestment and sanctions on Israel.

Libby Davies

During the interview, Davies admitted that she was unsure of her answers, saying she's not necessarily very "knowledgeable" about the Middle East.

Katz posted the interview online shortly afterward.

In the weeks following, calls for Davies' resignation and for her removal as the NDP's deputy leader came from the government – Prime Minister Stephen Harper has repeatedly asked the NDP to fire Davies during question periods in the House – as well as from the opposition Liberals. She was also publicly scolded by members of her own party, notably the NDP MP for Outremont, Thomas Mulcair, who called Davies' comments "grossly unacceptable".

Conservatives, Liberals call for deputy leader's removal

NDP Leader Jack Layton said Davies' views are "not party policy," but he's given no indication he will remove her from leadership positions within the NDP.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) said Davies' views are not surprising, given her history of being "consistently hostile towards Israel… and [she] has displayed a unidimensional approach in understanding the conflict in the region."

In a statement last week, B'nai Brith Canada also called for Davies' removal for what it described as "outrageous remarks."

"Layton has gone on the record… stating that her remarks are not the policy of his party. If that is the case, then [he] should take the next step and relieve Davies of her leadership positions in the party," Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith's executive vice-president said.

On June 11, Davies issued a written apology on her website, which read:

"My reference to the year 1948 as the beginning of the Israeli occupation of Palestinian territory was a serious and completely inadvertent error. I apologize for this and regret any confusion it has caused. I have always supported a two-state solution to the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian conflict and have never questioned Israel's right to exist and the Palestinian's right to a viable state.

"New Democrats have long called for a peaceful, negotiated end to the conflict where Israelis and Palestinians can live side by side with secure borders. This is a policy I fully support. I reject the allegation that I hate Israel, and I reject the assertion that I said that Israel is illegitimate or an abomination. Neither are true."

An unfinished story

From the editor's desk...

Many people regard As a Driven Leaf, the novel written by the late Rabbi Milton Steinberg as a masterpiece of modern literature.

First published in 1939 and since re-released by Behrman House Inc., the historical novel is a profoundly moving, provocative work that still has the power to hold the reader rapt in attention even as, or perhaps because, the reader is forced to think through, re-examine and re-accept the foundational norms of Jewish theology and Jewish life.

The novel focuses on the person of and the life led by the ancient talmudic sage Elisha ben Abuyah.

References to Abuyah in the pages of the Talmud are enigmatic and cryptic. Yet Steinberg imagines the brilliant scholar renouncing his faith after he can no longer reconcile the apparent paradoxes and contradictions of life on earth, the chief one being why bad things happen to good people. Steinberg essentially describes an Abuyah who felt betrayed by his faithfulness to his God.

The force of the novel stemmed from a number of factors, the most compelling of which were the inventiveness of Steinberg's imagination, the consistently cadenced literary style he demonstrated in his mastery of descriptive passages and dialogue, and the absolutely total relevance of the moral issues he raised to the contemporary context of his time.

Steinberg died in 1950 at the age of 46.

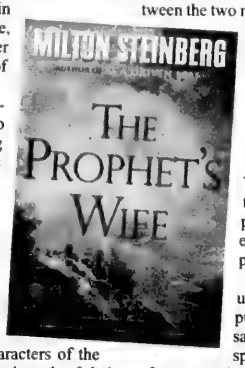
At the time of his death, the teacher-rabbi-writer-scholar was working on a second novel of the same historical genre as the vastly successful As A Driven Leaf.

The second novel was called The Prophet's Wife. It imagines the life and times of the eighth-century BCE prophet Hosea and his love for the beautiful woman, Gomer, whom he took to wife. Alas, Steinberg died before he completed the work.

Behrman House Inc., has recently taken the bold step of publishing the manuscript.

We do not know how far along the author believed the story to be before the pen was taken out of his hand. Nor do we know where, ultimately, he intended to lead it or how it would resolve.

The story ends quite abruptly, clearly unfinished, in the midst of a scene depicting an attempt by rebels to overthrow the northern kingdom of Israel. Indeed, quite hauntingly, Steinberg died merely hours after he wrote the last details in the book's final scene, in which we encounter a vision of the angel of death.



Steinberg's descriptive ability to visualize and bring to life ancient times is uncanny. In addition, his ability to endow thin, threadbare sketches of the characters we find in the Bible with fully formed human dimension is simply ingenious. We encounter the key characters of the novel in the intertwined mesh of their emotional, psychological and intellectual predicaments.

Further, the language Steinberg deploys is an exquisite form of what one could call modern biblical. It maintains the authoritative sound and structure of a King James-like Bible while using lighter, contemporary vocabulary and structure.

As with Abuyah in As A Driven Leaf, Steinberg's Hosea struggles with issues and dilemmas that resonate with the contemporary reader: worship, morality, faith, loyalty, betrayal.

The essence of The Prophet's Wife, of course, is Hosea's relationship with his exceptional wife, Gomer. Steinberg is honest, even brutally so, in establishing and describing that relationship.

But Hosea's relationship with Gomer is only one of the many relationships that course through Hosea's life weaving their knotted ties in his doubt-ridden character. For example, the dramatic encounter between the young Hosea and the older Amos is a pivotal moment for Hosea. At the time, he was a novice scribe in the service of the priests. But the chance meeting between the two men steers Hosea's character toward a quality he did not anticipate.

The Prophet's Wife is esthetically pleasing and skilfully executed. However, it suffers because the actual narrative plot is unfinished. The story ends with too many details of the prophet's life, indeed even his standing as a prophet, unresolved.

It is for that reason undoubtedly that the publisher has "compensated" the reader, so to speak, by inviting a trio of renowned thinkers and writers – journalist Ari Goldman, Rabbi Harold Kushner and Norma Rosen – to add their own commentaries and speculations to the final work.

The Prophet's Wife is not as overwhelming a reading experience as As A Driven Leaf. But it is so very nice, nevertheless to once again engage with Rabbi Steinberg, using his insights and reflections as guideposts for our own lives.

NATURE AND INTERFAITH LEARNING

Grade 7 and 8 students from the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School and their counterparts from the Islamic Foundation School met recently for the third time at the Kavanah Organic Community Teaching Garden at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont., to learn about people's relationship with the natural world. The students studied Jewish and Muslim texts about the environment, planted using biblical measurements, learned about Jewish agricultural laws and explored the Jewish ethic of bal tashchit, not being wasteful, which is also a Muslim ethic.

Classes to teach life skills to formerly homeless

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

People who have been trying to make the transition from homelessness to sustainable living off the streets will be able to learn useful skills in a new program offered by the humanitarian organization Ve'ahavta.

"A lot of people get lonely and uncomfortable in their own homes and resort to relapsing or using drugs again because they feel isolated and lonely," said Theresa Schrader, founder and director of the Ve'ahavta Street Academy.

The eight-week program, which begins June 29, will run classes on, among other subjects, life skills, diversity training, conflict resolution and communication.

"After you're homeless for so long, everything changes," Schrader said, adding that she views education, particularly post-secondary education, as a way to escape poverty.

Schrader lived on the streets of Toronto for a decade, and the two years before that in Nova Scotia. She has been clean of drugs for four years and has enrolled in the social worker program at George Brown College.

"I can kind of set an example of somebody who was on the street addicted to crack," she said, adding that she's now in school and a single mother. "I have a passion for showing people that the journey is possible."

Avrum Rosensweig, president of Ve'ahavta, said he once heard about a program that gave philosophy courses to people living on the streets of New York City.

"It made sense because the people living on the street are so raw in nature that they think a lot about survival," he said. "And when people think about survival, they become very philosophical."

Theresa Schrader is founder and director of the Ve'ahavta Street Academy, drawing on her experiences as a former homeless person to help others in similar situations.

This program is similar, with the ultimate goal of helping the participants gain confidence and a stronger sense of self, as well as to teach them a means of finding a way off the streets, he said.

The program gives participants a $20 honorarium per day in addition to a taste of what it's like to be in a school setting.

Schrader has also reserved spots for some participants in the Redirection Through Education program at George Brown College.

Ve'ahavta Street Academy co-chair Karen Ehrlich said the goal "is to empower these students and to give them the confidence, self-respect, life skills, positive role models and mentors to assist them in reaching their own unique goals."

Schrader was the 2005 winner of Ve'ahava's creative writing contest for the homeless.

"I really saw I had potential, and it really gave me a lot of confidence," she said. "From that point moving forward, my life has dramatically improved."

The idea behind writing for a contest is that if somebody writes down their thoughts and experiences, it can help them rehabilitate, Rosensweig explained, adding that the new classes follow a similar logic.

Ehrlich said the program has a lot of potential to do wonderful work for the homeless community, largely thanks to Schrader's attitude and willingness to help. "She's insightful, brave and bright."

Schrader is open to sharing her stories and life experiences in order to help other homeless people, and to offer them the necessary tools, skills and hope they need to move forward with their lives, Ehrlich said.

Ve'ahavta is also working on finding methods for the students to continue to learn after the program has finished – for example, by finding mentors, Rosensweig said.

The idea of helping people capable of getting off the streets is part of an ongoing change at Ve'ahavta, which has historically run programs primarily to help what Rosensweig called the chronically homeless.

"There are people who have the ability to get off because they aren't perhaps as badly damaged or hurt," he said, referring to the people who will participate in the new program.

They also hope at least a couple of the students will be Jewish, he added.

Schrader said the program will surely be beneficial not only to the participants, but also to her.

"I wake up everyday invigorated about this program," she said. "This is my own way of sharing my hope and inspiration."

Bringing an Indian touch to synagogue

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

For 30 years, Congregation BINA has celebrated the High Holidays with a distinct Indian flavour.

The services, which are mostly in Hebrew, include prayers that use traditional Indian melodies, though the words are the same as Ashkenazi and Sephardi prayers – and they use a Sephardi prayer book.

The congregation was formed three decades ago when the founders, who originally came from India, were trying to find a way to educate their children in their traditions.

Founder Ann Samson said her children were studying at an Ashkenazi Jewish day school where they learned Ashkenazi traditions.

"They'd come home and say to me, 'You're doing it wrong. You're singing it wrong.'" she said. "And we would try to say to them, 'It's not wrong. It's different, but that doesn't make it wrong.'"

The synagogue's services allow Jews from an Indian background to maintain their traditions after immigrating to Canada, and introduces Jews from other backgrounds to the unique melodies of the prayers.

Shai Abraham, vice-president of the synagogue, said she was born in India, moved to Israel with her family as a child and finally relocated to Toronto.

When she attended her first BINA service, "it was very emotional and meaningful," she said. "There was nostalgia, and these memories and tunes I had as a child all came back."

The B'nai Israel Jewish community was primarily based around Mumbai (formerly Bombay), India, she said. It began around 730 BCE, when Jews left Canaan to flee the Syrians. They headed to the west coast of India, but their ship was wrecked. Fourteen people – seven men and seven women – settled not far from their intended destination and began a community there.

They lost their religious artifacts at sea, she said, but they continued to follow many Jewish traditions, such as strictly following the laws of kashrut, avoiding fires during Shabbat, reciting the Shema and circumcising their sons on the eighth day.

In the 11th century, David Rahabi, a Jewish merchant, found the community and identified them, she continued.

"We learned some of the new developments, but we kept some of the old traditions," she said.

Many of the concepts behind the traditions are consistent among the various groups. For example, on Rosh Hashanah, many Jews follow the custom of eating apples and honey to symbolize a sweet new year.

Some families in Congregation BINA tend to cook the apples in sugar water to make a spread, Samson said; however, the idea behind the food is the same.

Although there are cultural differences, Abraham stressed that Jews everywhere adapted the religion to fit the culture of their areas, just as Indian traditions influenced B'nai Israel.

BINA is the Hebrew word for "understanding," and is also an acronym for Beth Israel of North America. Although the congregation wanted the name B'nai Israel of North America, Abraham said, it was already taken, so they settled for Beth Israel.

Their goal is to eventually have their own building so that they can run Saturday services and keep their Torahs in one location, said Victor Abraham, a founder of the synagogue. The congregation currently rents space from the National Council of Jewish Women at 4700 Bathurst St. in Toronto for services. But they don't expect to get their own space any time soon.

"It's like waiting for the Messiah," he said. "The dream is there, but we are not saying it must happen tomorrow."

One challenge is the need to keep the costs low, Samson said. One of the reasons the synagogue started was that immigrants often could not afford to pay the high membership fees at other shuls.

If the congregation bought a building, the operating costs would dramatically increase, and they want to maintain their ability to integrate new immigrants through their affordable membership fees, she said.

Instead, some people in the congregation belong to other synagogues and meet at Congregation BINA for the High Holidays, Victor Abraham said.

Meanwhile, the synagogue continues to grow, with many new, young families joining the congregation, Shai Abraham said, adding that they now have 120 members, some single people and some families.

The founding members of the board have passed on their positions to the younger generation in order for the congregation to continue evolving, Samson said.

"You can't stay on the board forever," she said. "For an organization to survive, you have to have others take control."

Libbie Cowan Childcare Centre fills vital need in Jewish life downtown

New facility another success story at Miles Nadal JCC

By Daniel Horowitz

Responding to a void in Toronto's downtown Jewish community, the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, located at Bloor and Spadina, did what it has done since it first opened its doors on November 27, 2003. It found a solution.

Since 1953, the Miles Nadal JCC's predecessor, the Bloor "Y", had pre-natal facilities, a nursery school and a baby-sitting service; still the missing piece in its quest to complete the Jewish experience was daycare. But today, thanks to the Miles Nadal Centre's new Libbie Cowan Childcare Centre, which opened on April 12, 2010, that void no longer exists.

"It's the first of its kind in a downtown Jewish community centre," says Ellen Cole, executive director of the Miles Nadal JCC. "There was such a huge community need for this for decades, to take care of our 18 to 30 month-olds, to complete the Jewish journey. We recognized the need for a high-quality day care downtown, and this more than fits the bill."

That need was proven almost immediately with the new facility opening with ten children, which more than doubled to 24 less than a month later, and was quickly filled to its maximum of 30 by August, with more than 50 on its burgeoning waiting list.

Then again, there's nothing new about membership at the Miles Nadal JCC growing exponentially. The brand new facility - built with the supportive lead gift of Miles Nadal and other generous donations through UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign - opened with approximately 800 members, with the target of reaching 1,500 by the end of its first year, 2,500 by the end of its second year, 3,000 by year number three and 3,500 in year four.

"That was the plan, but, we reached our maximum capacity of 3,500 members by June, 2007," explains Cole. "Much of the success of the Miles Nadal JCC is in its outreach to the downtown community, Jewish and non-Jewish alike. A lot of people connect to their Jewish roots through the programming we offer, whether it's our Sunday lectures, classes or socializing. And, of course, another great asset we offer is the Al Green Theatre, which brings the best of Jewish culture downtown."

Cole also credits much of the success of the Miles Nadal JCC to its immediate past board chair, Harold Wolkin, who was brought in by UJA Federation during construction of the new facility for a three-year term.

"If ever there was a man who walks the walk it's Harold," says Cole. "He has understood every step that we have taken to grow and improve the Miles Nadal JCC, and he has been there with his advice, his wise counsel, and his insistence that no matter what adversity we might face we take the high road. What a mentor, what a role model, what a helpmate. And as a parting gesture, he and Shelley brought forward the lead gift for the Libbie Cowan Childcare Centre. Harold always knew that this JCC had special goals – to build an accessible entry ramp and to create a daycare to meet the community needs. I am deeply indebted to him for his lead and his encouragement."

"I am thrilled with the progress and success of the Miles Nadal JCC," says Miles Nadal. "It is an institution which began with a dream, and its association with my family has changed our lives. The leadership of Ellen Cole and Harold Wolkin and the rest of the board has been excellent and they've done a remarkable job shepherding the JCC through difficult economic times, and it continues to grow and prosper. The opportunity for the JCC to expand in terms of membership and its outreach to the community knows no boundaries, and I will continue to personally invest time, talent and treasure into this remarkable institution."

"The past three years have been most interesting, challenging at times, but also the most gratifying of my volunteer career," says Wolkin. "Over the past few years, there has been a great emphasis placed on improving service, particularly to our fitness members. I am pleased that recent surveys clearly show that members are highly satisfied. At the same time, we have filled the building with wonderful programs, lectures and other events tied to both our roots in the community and to our Jewish heritage. As a consequence, more and more people are having meaningful and inspiring experiences at our JCC. I also want to thank UJA Federation which has always taken an active interest in our progress and success and has been a great partner to work with."

"Harold's leadership has helped to further propel the Miles Nadal JCC to higher and higher levels of excellence," says UJA president & CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "During Harold's term in office and, at a time when more and more Jewish families are returning downtown, the community's investment in the MNJCC has proven to be both vital and timely."

The hurt that wounds deepest

The idea of the unity and the deeply felt, almost structural interconnectednesss of the Jewish people is centrally embedded in our liturgy, in our folklore and in the most earnest teachings of our sages. For example, "Chaverim kol Yisrael" (All Israel are friends) appears as both a plea and a description in the Shabbat prayer ushering in the new month in both Ashkenaz and Sephard liturgical traditions. The Jews of the Edot Mizrach (from North Africa and the Arabian peninsula) use a different formula of words to enshrine the very same thought, namely "Amo Yisrael b'chol makom sh'haym" (His people Israel wherever they reside).

The articulation of that idea, however, has always been more of a wishful thought than a statement of fact.

The Jewish people is a fractious peoplehood. We delude ourselves to think otherwise. During times of severe existential crisis we have managed to lay down the flags of our numerous divisions, but we have never managed to throw them away once and for all.

The very worst of intra-Jewish factionalism was on display last week in Israel.

In response to an order by the Supreme Court of Israel last Thursday attempting to enforce a decision to end the segregation of Sephardi and Ashkenazi girls in a Beit Yaakov school in the town of Immanuel, tens of thousands of haredim marched in protest in Jerusalem and in Bnei Brak.

The court had ordered 43 sets of parents from the Immanuel school in question who were in violation of the anti-segregation order to serve two weeks in jail. The women were spared the jail order, at least temporarily. An attempt to modify the sentence was being mediated on the weekend.

This was the third effort by the court to enforce the order. The first two imposed fines on the school and then on some of the offending parents, respectively. The case has been in the courts for many months as the court attempts to dismantle what it has termed a policy of racism on the part of the segregationist school and families. The school had even built separate entrances and a dividing wall through the school's courtyard for the Sephardi and Ashkenazi girls.

True to demagogic form, some of the protesters carried signs blandishing non-sequitur slogans – such as "We choose Torah," "High Court against the people" and "God will rule for all eternity" – that were entirely inappropriate and unrelated to the situation, that missed the point entirely and intended only to deflect attention away from the egregious discrimination of the segregationist school.

The school is funded entirely by the government. The State of Israel has the right and the duty to ban such abhorrent discrimination, for it is the hurt that wounds us – the Jewish people – the deepest.

Queers would be jailed in Arab countries

It would appear that Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) is going to march in Toronto's Pride parade (in some form). This notwithstanding, that if these queers announce their homosexuality in Gaza or in most Arab countries, they would face imprisonment and, in some cases, death. They fail to acknowledge that Israel allows gay pride parades, and gays and lesbians are permitted to co-habitate there without fear of prosecution. Perhaps after the Toronto parade, QuAIA can visit Gaza, where they will be honoured for their support of the Palestinian cause.

Not 'punished' for criticizing Israel

Letter writer Judy Haiven cannot understand why the mainstream of the Canadian Jewish community does not join with her in agreeing that Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza is immoral and illegal ("Criticizing Israel," June 17). After all, she opines, our opinions are "merely rhetorical" and have little influence.

She will find the answer to her question by reading her own words. Rational, fair-minded people, Jews and non-Jews alike, do not happen to think that Israel is acting in immoral and illegal ways. Conversely, they believe that accusations levelled against Israel are without logic and biased.

The printing of her letter by The CJN, an "establishment" pro-Israel publication, belies her claim of being "punished" for her views, a luxury she would not enjoy in Gaza or the West Bank.

Criticism of Israel vs. anti-Semitism

Letter writer Judy Haiven asks why, when Israeli Jews carry signs that read "Zionists Are Not Settlers," they are not called self-hating Jews or anti-Semites ("Criticizing Israel," June 17). The answer is straightforward. As the sign acknowledges, these protesters are not denigrating Zionism or claiming to be anti-Zionist. Nor are they accusing or calling Israel an apartheid state. Criticism is legitimate. However, the demonization of Israel by calling it apartheid, and the delegitimization of Israel in denying Zionism, that is, the fundamental and inalienable right of Jews to national self-determination, is racist and hence anti-Semitic.

The true Palestinian state

I wish to endorse Goldi Steiner's letter and add that after World War I, nearly 80 per cent of what was then then known as Palestine was chopped off by the British and French and given as a gift to the Hashemite nomads and called Transjordan ("Our right to all the Land of Israel," June 10). This is your true Palestinian state. We do not need any more Arab states. The land from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean, the 20 per cent that was left, was acknowledged by the League of Nations and the San Remo Conference and given de jure recognition as the historic Jewish homeland.

Alan Edwards

God's law not basis for borders

In her letter to the editor, Goldi Steiner declares that under God's law and international law, Jews are entitled to all the Land of Israel and are not required to yield territory ("Our right to all the Land of Israel," June 10).

In the case of God's law, as not everyone subscribes to the same religion, this is obviously not a basis for determining borders. Israel may be a Jewish state, but it is not a theocracy, and a law based on biblical texts would have no validation among non-believers.

On the matter of international law, Steiner asserts that the Palestine Mandate gave Jews an irrevocable right to all the land of Israel. Unfortunately, she fails to recognize that international law is created by human beings and changes over time based on circumstances and values. Whether Palestinians as a people existed in the 1920s or even the 1940s is irrelevant. They exist now and are entitled to a home.

There will never be full peace in the region until the Palestinians stop resorting to violence and hate as a means of addressing their grievances. However, the attitude among some that the Palestinians are nothing more than a nuisance or obstacle standing in the way of a superior Jewish people's God-given entitlement to all the land they want is an equal contributor to the problem.

U.S. and Israel agree – for now

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

The relationship between the Obama administration, the Netanyahu government and the pro-Israel community is ensconced on all fronts in "agree, for now" mode.

On isolating Iran, everyone agrees – and is pleased – that the new set of UN sanctions will make it easier for the United States to enhance its own unilateral sanctions.

Differences are looming, however, on whether the U.S. sanctions should carve out exemptions for countries that helped push through the UN sanctions.

On peace talks, the consensus is to move from U.S.-brokered proximity talks between the Israelis and the Palestinians to direct talks.

That was the message Obama administration officials and U.S. Jewish organizational leaders made forcefully this month to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas during his Washington visit, and it's one that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and U.S. President Barack Obama likely will make the centrepiece of their summit later this month. And all sides want Abbas to step up when it comes to dealing with Palestinian incitement against Israel.

There is less agreement, though, on whether direct talks – if they ever launch – would address the core issues of Jerusalem, borders and refugees.

Iran and peace talks are the perennials when it comes to how the United States and Israel co-ordinate policy, but more temporal issues also are proving critical in defining the relationship.

The fallout from Israel's deadly May 31 raid on the Mavi Marmara, a Turkish-flagged ship that was part of an aid flotilla aimed at breaching Israel's embargo of the Gaza Strip, also has produced an "agree, for now" moment: The United States is backing the commission that Israel has set up to investigate the incident, but is withholding its full approval until the commission delivers its report.

The most immediate prospect of differences has to do with a set of enhanced Iran sanctions now under consideration by the U.S. Congress. Congressional leaders had withheld the sanctions, aimed at forcing Iran to make its nuclear ambitions more transparent, in order not to complicate the administration's efforts to get the UN Security Council sanctions passed.

Congress now wants to pass its unilateral sanctions. The two sets of sanctions complement one another. The UN sanctions are narrower, focusing principally on arms trading and the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps, but they also refer broadly to the rights of individual nations to target Iran's energy and banking sectors, which is precisely what the enhanced congressional sanctions would do.

The problem is that the White House wants an exception for Russia and China, nations that trade heavily with Iran and were critical in passing the Security Council sanctions.

"The challenge has been to ensure that other countries would see the legislation as penalizing the Iranians and not them," a senior White House official told JTA.

Not so fast, say congressional leaders, backed by the mainstream pro-Israel groups, including the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

"The president wants, as any president wants, flexibility in this legislation, and I understand why they want that," Senator Ben Cardin (D-Md.) told a luncheon hosted by the Orthodox Union for U.S. senators this month. "But this is a situation and this is an issue where we are not going to give them waivers."

U.S. Special Envoy George Mitchell met last week in Jerusalem with Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak. They discussed common issues related to the proximity talks with the Palestinian Authority. [Israel Sun photo]

The congressional package is due to pass by the end of the month – about the time that Netanyahu is due in Washington for a summit with Obama to discuss Iran strategies and to assess progress on proximity talks with the Palestinians.

In their meeting, Obama pressed Abbas on moving forward to direct talks.

"We believe that with Israelis and the Palestinian Authority coming together, making clear that a peaceful, nonviolent solution that recognizes both the security needs of Israel as well as the legitimate aspirations of Palestinians is the right way to go, can yield real progress in the coming months," Obama said after the meeting.

U.S. Jewish leaders who met with the Palestinian leader at a private dinner hosted by the Center for Middle East Peace made the same case.

Abbas' reply was that he wants to see movement on core issues before advancing to direct talks. He didn't elaborate, but when it comes to negotiating core issues, the Palestinians traditionally have sought the cover of major powers to address the power imbalance they see between Israel and themselves.

The core issues could prove problematic to the U.S.-Israel relationship, at least if they emerge during the period when Obama and Netanyahu are in office. Netanyahu is not committed to the "1967 lines, with adjustments" borders his predecessors had offered, and is opposed to sharing Jerusalem with the Palestinians.

The Jewish leaders also pressed Abbas on the issue of incitement. In his news conference Abbas denied that incitement was an issue, but with the Jewish leaders he acknowledged that he could do more. Abbas said he recognized ancient Jewish claims to the land, but he expressed frustration that his advances against incitement have gone without Israeli or Jewish recognition.

"I unified all the sermons in the West Bank – it is the first time, it is the first country around the Arab world, around the Islamic world, that these sermons are unified, only in the West Bank because I don't want any incitement against anybody," he said, according to notes provided by the Center for Middle East Peace.

Some participants, who included top Jewish organizational leaders, former senior government officials and local leaders, said they were pleased by Abbas' grace, but noted also that he and others in the PA leadership in the last year had praised terrorists.

"I suggested to him that you can't have it both ways," said Rabbi Stuart Weinblatt of Congregation B'nei Tzedek in suburban Maryland. "I said that I hope he would speak to his people and tell them that they will not be able to get everything they want, and that all sides will have to make sacrifices."

Jeremy Ben-Ami, director of J Street, the pro-Israel group that lobbies for U.S. pressure to achieve a two-state solution, said he was frustrated by the dinner's emphasis on extremism.

"We have a man ready to make peace, and we raised television shows and said for that reason he is not a partner," Ben-Ami complained.

Arabs favour tough Iran sanctions, poll finds

JTA

BERLIN — Residents of several Arab countries strongly favour tougher sanctions on Iran to curb its nuclear ambitions, a new poll shows.

Respondents in Egypt, Jordan and Lebanon were among the most supportive of such sanctions, according to the ninth annual Pew Global Attitudes Project released June 17 in Berlin and Washington. Most countries with high numbers of Muslims favoured a tough stance on Iran, with only Pakistan and India disagreeing.

The survey of 25,000 individuals in 22 countries was completed in May and was co-sponsored by the German-based Bertelsmann Foundation.

Survey questions covered such topics as views of the United States; U.S. President Barack Obama and his foreign policy; attitudes toward Iran, China and European nations; and views on terrorism and environmental issues.

Israel, which was included in a larger survey last year, was not included for budgetary reasons, according to U.S.-based journalist Bruce Stokes, a consultant for the study.

On Iran, Obama received mixed reviews. In Lebanon, Christians and Sunni Muslims tended to approve of the U.S. president's policies, at 62 per cent and 61 per cent, respectively, while 98 per cent of Shia Muslims disapproved. At 62 per cent, Pakistanis were the most disapproving of further sanctions against Iran, while Egypt, Jordan and Lebanon were among those strongly favouring tougher sanctions.

Turkey was the only Islamic country in which those opposing military intervention to stop Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons slightly outnumbered those who favoured it, 37 per cent to 29 percent.

Overall, Obama received poor grades for his handling of the Mideast conflict from countries with high numbers of Muslims, with only France, Nigeria and Kenya showing a majority approving of his policies.

Obama is "amazingly passive on the Israel-Palestinian problem and I am not sure why," former U.S. Ambassador to Germany John Kornblum said at the news conference in Berlin releasing the data.

In the United States, 41 per cent said they disapproved of Obama's handling of the Middle East. The highest disapproval came from Egypt, Jordan and Lebanon – 88 per cent, 84 per cent and 90 per cent, respectively.

According to the report, "Clear majorities in Turkey (66 per cent) and Indonesia (56 per cent) also disapprove" of his Mideast policies. Opposition to Obama's anti-terrorism efforts also has grown in Muslim countries such as Turkey, Egypt, Jordan and Lebanon.

Stokes told JTA that there was no way to deduce whether critics found Obama too tough on Israel or not tough enough.

"For the purposes of the question, it was just how is he doing, and he seems to be doing less well on that issue than on other issues," Stokes said.

Overall, Obama still enjoys far higher popularity ratings abroad than at home, the study showed. However, his popularity in Muslim countries, except for Indonesia, where Obama lived for a few years as a child, has dropped dramatically over the past year. In Egypt the percentage of Muslims expressing confidence in Obama fell from 41 per cent to 31 per cent, and in Turkey from 33 per cent to 23 per cent.

Proud Canadians

Last month, the Sunnybrook Hospital Foundation in Toronto celebrated Dr. Marvin Tile's appointment to the Order of Canada. All speakers stressed his enormous contribution as a former chief, as a world famous orthopedic surgeon, as the author of widely used textbooks and as a beloved mentor to colleagues around the world, including Israel.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Tile had done much for Canada and greatly deserves the honour bestowed on him. But his response to the many accolades was about how much Canada had done for him and his family when it admitted the poor young Jewish immigrants who became his parents. In gratitude, he deemed it a privilege to do something for this country and, together with his wife, Esther, inculcate the same sense of pride and obligation in their children and grandchildren.

Canada gave them wings on which they've soared, but their roots are in eastern Europe. Like most Canadian Jews, they're "hyphenated" Canadians: born to immigrant parents with a strong commitment to their Jewish heritage.

At the end of the celebration, Tile presented each guest with a copy of the short memoir he had just published that describes his and Esther's visit to Poland. Their journey of discovery that became something of a pilgrimage took them not only to places of family origins, but also to Auschwitz and Majdanek, where many relatives had perished.

The richly illustrated monograph, aptly titled Severed Roots, is also something of a commentary on the way Jews view their place in Canadian society. Without forgetting the anti-Semitism they were subjected to as youngsters – and Jewish doctors, particularly those older than Tile, whose appointments were often barred, felt it even more keenly than others – Jews today unequivocally and enthusiastically celebrate the country. As expressions of gratitude, many now work on behalf of other minorities. Immigrants are among Tile's most grateful patients.

Though anti-Semitic incidents still occur and demand our continued vigilance, Canada is today one of the most privileged communities in the Jewish Diaspora. It's also one of the few Jewish communities outside Israel that's growing in population and influence.

Part of this sense of being in the right place expresses itself in the Jews' involvement in the life of Canada and their enthusiastic commitment to Israel. Tile is a distinguished exponent of both.

After his visit to Poland, he wrote: "We are happy to be back on Canadian soil, back with family and friends, and to live as proud Canadians, and stand with the Jewish people." Marvin and Esther Tile speak for most Canadian Jews.

Random thoughts at a concert

Here I am in Koerner Hall in the Telus Centre of the Royal Conservatory listening to George Frideric Handel's Israel in Egypt while the world outside is bristling with Israel's latest "sin" of self-defence, this time enforcing the naval blockade of Gaza. And as I wonder about Handel's selective use of the account in Exodus as read by him in the King James Bible, and probably also his native German, I wonder, too, if the audience has noted his identification with the enslaved Israelites. He goes so far as to make the music accompanying the narrative of the plagues somewhat joyous and playful, something our midrashic tradition forbade. We were never permitted to enjoy the suffering of our enemies.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

And how many times in the past few years have we seen our enemies dance in the streets at the news of another terrorist attack against innocent Jews?

Handel and his European roots remind me of that message so many of us received a few years back. "My grandparents were confronted with signs all over Europe before the war: 'Jews get out – go to Palestine.' Now we see: 'Jews get out of Palestine.'" Let them make up their minds.

Israel in Egypt brings to mind a little-known chapter of pre-1948 Zionist history. I wonder (lots of wondering is possible during a lengthy Handel piece) how the audience thinks of Israel. Is this just biblical Israel, the Israelites, or do they identify Israel with the modern nation state of that name?

There was, in fact, some disagreement about the name of the country-to-be. Some preferred the name Judea or Yehuda, precisely to prevent the confusion between Israel, the people, and Israel, a new state. The argument was that if you asked a child in school to explain Shema Yisrael, he or she might think this was a directive to the Israeli government, not a key phrase of Jewish faith. Who knows? Perhaps calling the state Palestine might have solved some later problems.

Again, a random memory surfaces. I was called to the government censor's office in Morocco during my years in that country for trying to import Zionist literature. The book in question was a French volume about Israelites (French for Jews), and I had to convince the government bureaucrat that it was not about Israeliens (French for Israelis).

Handel must have been inspired by what we call Shirat Hayam, Moses' Song at the Sea. It is, after all, a song written in poetic form, and Handel was writing an oratorio or sacred drama in song. Handel's version is different from the edited version in our siddur in that it includes verses 20 and 21 of Exodus 15, the extra singing and dancing of Miriam, the prophetess. Much to the chagrin of many in our modern times, our rabbis didn't include Miriam's contribution in our liturgy. The traditional Catholic liturgy uses the text of Exodus 15 in its Easter Vigil service as the church comes out of mourning late Saturday night and celebrates the joy of Easter Sunday. We Jews have a tradition to feed the birds on the Shabbat when Shirat Hayam is read, the notion being that we had forgotten how to sing while enslaved in Egypt. At the sea, the legend goes, the birds taught us how to sing God's praises. Once again, a Moroccan memory of how beautifully this song is sung in synagogue during the morning service. It wasn't Handel, but inspiring all the same.

A Jew goes to hear a Christian rendition of his own tradition and thinks random thoughts…

Yahoo weather: cloudy with a chance of politics?

I'm a devotee of the iPhone weather application. Before travelling, I add my destinations to the set of cities whose weather is automatically updated. Once home, I delete them.

But wherever I am, three locales have a permanent place on my weather app: Toronto, city of my home; New York, city of my birth, and Jerusalem, city of my soul. It's Yehuda Halevi transmuted into today's technology: I am in the West, but my heart knows the weather in the East.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

About a month ago, I noticed that the Jerusalem weather report no longer functioned. The other locales were automatically updated when I tapped the weather icon, but the Jerusalem screen remained blank. At first, I thought this was a momentary systems glitch. But the problem persisted.

So I did what any seasoned technology user has learned to do with balky programs: I deleted Jerusalem and then restored it. That's when I realized that the issue wasn't simply technological. My search for "Jerusalem" within the weather app turned up a locale listed as "Yerushalayim" and "west Jerusalem, Israel." Adding it gave me a listing for "west Jerusalem." I was pleased to obtain regular updates for Jerusalem weather, but puzzled by the change in nomenclature. I wondered what the boundaries of "west Jerusalem" were and what the weather in the rest of Jerusalem was like.

So I went back into the weather application and tried some other searches to see if the missing parts of the city still had weather. "East Jerusalem" yielded a second option: "east Jerusalem, Palestinian Occupied Territories." Same weather.

The iPhone's weather app utilizes weather data provided by the Weather Channel (available at weatherchannel.com), but filtered through a Yahoo interface, or as the app notes, "powered by Yahoo." Was the change in Jerusalem's status conferred by the Weather Channel or by Yahoo? A quick call to the Weather Channel indicated that nothing had changed for them, something confirmed by a quick visit to their website. Their weather data comes from a single weather station in Jerusalem and remained listed as "Jerusalem, Israel."

Yahoo, as it turned out, had altered its interface so that it now made a political rather than simply a meteorological statement. Both west and east listings drew on the Weather Channel's report for "Jerusalem, Israel."

Apparently, I wasn't the only one to notice the encroachment of politics into my supposedly neutral app. It seems that there were sufficient protests to both Apple and Yahoo to reverse the change. The "west Jerusalem" locale that I added several weeks ago still functions. But today a search for "Jerusalem" yields just that, and I was able to add it to the app as a listing.

But all is not back to normal with Yahoo's weather reporting. At their weather website (weather.yahoo.com) a search for Jerusalem weather requires the following link sequence: International–Asia–Israel–Yerushalayim. Then one must choose between "Zova" and "Jerusalem." Alternatively, one can obtain the identical data through the following links: International–Asia–Palestinian Occupied Territories–West Bank –Tsameret Habira. Tsameret Ha-bira, literally meaning the summit of the capital, is used to refer to neighbourhoods in and around French Hill and Mount Scopus.

For most of us, talk about the weather connotes safe, neutral – one might even say bland – territory. Meteorologists and enthusiasts of extreme phenomena aside, the subject of weather suggests itself as a diversion from conversations that take an unwanted turn to the personal, contentious or discomfiting, filling awkward silences and providing innocuous, if boring, chit-chat at social gatherings.

But Yahoo has managed to turn the weather report into a tendentious political issue, insidiously slipping into advocacy unannounced. Personally, I prefer my meteorology straight up. I could add the Weather Channel's own app to my iPhone and bypass Yahoo's politicized filter. But the Yahoo weather app, which comes preloaded, is one of the few that can't be deleted from the iPhone, at least without jail-breaking the device. So I'll continue to monitor its report. Who knows what countries it might create?

How about that weather?

The Kirshner File

Letter from The Hague

The spirit of Baruch (Benedict) Spinoza, the great 17th century Dutch-Jewish philosopher, hovers over The Hague, the seat of government in the Netherlands.

Spinoza (1632-1677), the scion of Portuguese Jews, lived and worked here during his last seven years, earning a livelihood as a lowly lens grinder after having been excommunicated by the Jewish community in 1656.

Sheldon Kirshner in The Netherlands

A rationalist widely credited for laying the foundation of the 18th century Enlightenment, Spinoza incurred the wrath of blinkered Jewish elders by adopting positions that ran contrary to prevailing Jewish beliefs and norms.

Thrown out of the community, Spinoza left Amsterdam, his birthplace, and lived in Rijnsburg and Voorburg before settling down in The Hague, where he finished Ethics, his posthumous magnum opus.

Three hundred and fifty years after his expulsion, Spinoza still remains controversial in some Jewish circles.

In the Netherlands, however, he is a towering figure. Before the Netherlands adopted the Euro in 2002, Spinoza's portrait was on the 1000-guilder bank note. To this day, the Netherlands' most prestigious science award is named after him.

The gabled building where Spinoza resided, and the statue that was erected in his honour in the 1920s and left untouched by the Nazis during their five-year occupation of the Netherlands, are both situated in The Hague's red light district on Doublestraat, a short street of window bordellos.

The juxtaposition is jarring, to say the least

Spinoza's final resting place, within the grounds of an important Protestant church, is relatively close to the most important Jewish building in this city, the Portuguese Synagogue.

Portuguese Jews were admitted to the Netherlands after the Spanish Inquisition, but Jewish settlement in The Hague – which is twinned with Nazareth, Israel and is the locale of the International Court of Justice and the International Criminal Court – did not begin until about the 17th century.

On Aug. 9, 1726, 30 years before Spinoza's excommunication, members of the Portuguese community inaugurated the synagogue, one of the oldest in the Netherlands, on Prinsessegracht, a street steps away from the central railway station and the embassy of Turkey.

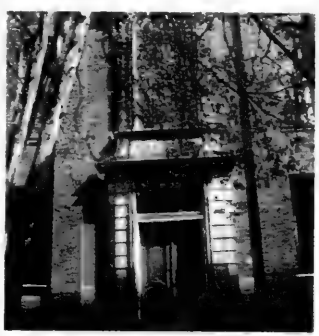
Designed in classical Dutch style by the architect Daniel Marot, the synagogue is plain rather than overpowering in its overall effect.

The front part of the building is sheathed in glass to protect it from the elements. Walls and a wrought iron gate provide further protection. Visitors are ushered in through an intercom system. Two chestnut trees in the courtyard are supposedly as old as the synagogue itself.

Radiating a sense of peace and quiet, the interior is simple and stolid. Whitewashed walls and grey Ionian pillars look down on deep brown oak benches and a rosewood ark.

During the Nazi occupation, from 1940 to 1945, Jews in The Hague and neighbouring Scheveningen, a pleasant seaside resort that is technically part of the city, were expelled and forced to live in Amsterdam before they were deported to death camps in Poland via the Westerbork camp in the Netherlands.

Ten thousand Jews, including 400 Portuguese Jews, resided in The Hague on the eve of World War II. Two thousand Jews, among them a handful of Portuguese Jews, survived the Nazi period, many in hiding.



The Portuguese Synagogue

After the war, a developer bought the Portuguese Synagogue, which was inexplicably spared by the Nazis. It remained neglected, falling into a state of disrepair. In 1968, the building was rented by the Liberal Jewish Community.

Four years later, the group bought and renovated it with the assistance of the Dutch government. Saved from ruination, the synagogue is regarded as a symbol of Jewish rebirth in the Netherlands since the Holocaust.

Extensive repairs to the roof were undertaken in 1992. Two years from now, the interior will be spruced up, said Henri Heijmans, the vice-president of the shul, which has a membership of some 250 families.

A monument to Baruch Spinoza

Prior to the war, a mid-19th century synagogue stood on Wagenstraat, in what is now Chinatown. Sold to Turkish Muslims in 1974, the building was converted into the Al Aqsa mosque in 1975. A minaret was later added.

The women's gallery remains intact, but the bimah is gone. The Torah scrolls were taken to Jerusalem. In accordance with Dutch preservation laws, a plaque on the side of the mosque, in Dutch and Hebrew, indicates its Jewish provenance.

The caretaker of the mosque did not wish to discuss its former status as a synagogue. Indeed, he appeared nervous by my visit.

Apart from the synagogue-turned mosque, Chinatown, demarcated by flamboyant arches, contains at least two inconspicuous reminders that this polyglot district was once predominantly Jewish.

Concrete reliefs and statues of two lambs and a ram above the door of the Chinese-frequented Star mini supermarket on Wagenstraat suggest that this was once a kosher butcher. Nearby, in a drab building, was a mikvah. Two formerly Jewish-owned department stores, de Bijenkorf and Maison de Bonnetree, stand on the edge of Chinatown.

The Hague's Great Synagogue, on Nieuwe Molstraat, was torn down in the 1970s and replaced by a four-storey apartment building.

Due to World War II, many buildings in The Hague are fairly new. The Nazis razed buildings to construct the defensive Atlantic Wall, while the Allies, in a catastrophic navigation error, bombed the city centre instead of a German V-2 rocket base.

The prewar Jewish orphanage on Paviljoensgracht, from which Jews were deported during the war, is now a seniors home.

On the same street, above the entrance of a bookshop, is an ensemble of Stars of David.

Near Chinatown, on Stille Veerkade, is a nondescript building that once housed a synagogue and a yeshiva.

There was a matzah factory on Jacobstraat until five years ago, but it's a toko, or Chinese food store, now.

On Rabbijn Maarsenplein, a square named after a rabbi murdered during the Holocaust, a red brick apartment building has supplanted a Jewish school.

A monument, composed of six silver iron chairs and engraved with such names as Joel, Aatiju, Mina and Julia, commemorates the deportation of 1,700 Jewish children from The Hague.

A plaque on the weathered wall of the church on whose grounds Spinoza was interred portrays a woman crying for all those children.

The city's main Holocaust memorial, a black stylized Star of David, seems lost in the bustle of the downtown core. Placed on a wall over 10 postal boxes, it faces the LA American Food kiosk and is next to Will's Pancake House. Whose idea was this?

The Voldersgracht, a busy shopping street in the heart of The Hague, was the site of a synagogue from 1723 until 1844.

In a dim space below street level, opposite a "green" food shop, a black marble plaque with Dutch and Hebrew lettering reminds passersby that a shul once stood here.

A remarkably detailed bronze model of The Hague's old Jewish neighbourhood, circa 1892, is enclosed inside a glass case on the second floor of the white, airy city hall, which was designed by the American architect Richard Meir.

Which brings us full circle.

Spinoza lived in this historic district until his untimely death.

Gossip and Judaism

Did you read on the Internet how a famous fashion designer once uttered a racist remark on a popular talk show – and was told to leave immediately? Well, if you did, forget about it. It's not true. [http://bit.ly/lashon1]

Although the Internet can be a wonderful source of knowledge, it has probably become the world's biggest breeding ground of malicious rumors, scurrilous innuendo and good old gossip. Or as Judaism would look at it, bad old gossip. The Internet may be new, but gossip has been around for thousands of years and Judaism has quite a bit to say about it.

Jewish & Digital
By Mark Mietkewicz

Gossip in Hebrew is usually translated as "lashon hara," literally the evil tongue. A piece of gossip may be true and it may even have been said without malice, but that does not make it any more acceptable in Jewish law. [http://bit.ly/lashon2]

One of the greatest proponents of codifying the laws against lashon hara was Rabbi Yisrael Meir Kagan (1838-1933), better known as the Chofetz Chaim. [http://bit.ly/lashon3] The Chofetz Chaim lists 31 commandments that may be violated when a person speaks or listens to lashon hara, including, "In righteousness shall you judge your neighbour" and "You shall not go about as a talebearer among your people." (Leviticus 19:15-16) [http://bit.ly/lashon12]

The Chofetz Chaim Heritage Foundation steps up its efforts at this time of year. On June 29, the fast of the 17th of Tammuz, we begin a three-week period of semi-mourning, known as the time when many national calamities have hit the Jews. But instead of blaming outside forces, the Talmud says that the cause of the destruction of the Second Temple was the senseless hatred and ill will displayed between Jews. Since gossip and ill will are very much contemporary issues within Judaism, the Chofetz Chaim Foundation has created videos and other programs to spread the message about lashon hara. [http://bit.ly/lashon5]

What do you do if you want to report the irresponsible behaviour of a co-worker while respecting the rules of lashon hara? According to the Professional Ethics and Halachah website, there are four situations when you are obligated to speak negatively about others:

- to help the person spoken about;
- to help or protect those negatively affected by the person being spoken about;
- to prevent a community dispute;
- and to help others learn from the first person's faults. [http://bit.ly/lashon6]

Rabbi Mark Dratch highlights a specific area in which keeping silent is unacceptable – in the case of abuse. He quotes the Orach Chayim: "There is a sin even greater than [speaking lashon hara], and one which is more widespread, i.e., the sin of refraining from informing another about a situation in which one can save him [or her] from being victimized – all out of concern for lashon hara." [http://bit.ly/lashon7]

Rabbi Moshe ben Asher tells how hurt he was when he found out that someone close to him had been uttering lashon hara about him. When there was no admission or apology on behalf of the friend, there was no forgiveness on behalf of the rabbi. And then the friend died. That prompted Rabbi ben Asher to do some soul searching about coming to terms with lashon hara. [http://bit.ly/lashon9]

So how do you break the gossip habit? Slowly. Choose an hour daily during which you will make a deliberate effort to speak no evil. Then gradually expand your gossip-free period. You can kick off your own campaign by making an anti-lashon hara pledge online. [http://bit.ly/lashon10]

And if you want to try something a bit more high-tech, join the Facebook group: No Lashon Hara for the Three Weeks! [http://bit.ly/lashon11]

Lessons from Disney World

Last month, my wife and I travelled to Walt Disney World. Walking the streets of the Magic Kingdom, riding the rides and visiting the characters is always an experience. And, in all truth, my wife and I have a special connection to the park, as it's where we started dating. That, however, is another story for another column.

I've always been fascinated by the operations at Disney. Every detail is studied. From the smell of popcorn when you enter the Magic Kingdom, to the miles of underground tunnels for support workers, to the culturally sensitive manner in which "cast members" point directions, Disney is a carefully choreographed show.

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

From this elaborate piece of theatre, I draw three important lessons that can help transform the way we think about Jewish community.

I thought my wife and I would be atypical Disney visitors. Surrounding us were thousands of parents pushing Mickey Mouse strollers with kids of all ages. Before heading to Florida, I feared that we would feel out of place: babied by kiddy rides and bored with no late night entertainment. But I was wrong. Disney seeks to provide an experience for any demographic. Of course, there are plenty of adventures for families, but next to the swarm of Disney characters are babysitting for parents who want a break and nightclubs for adults.

The first lesson our community can learn from Disney is to appeal to multiple demographics. Disney offers something for everyone, from the preschooler to the student on spring break, from the parents who want respite from their children to the retired couple seeking a quiet vacation. How can our synagogues and JCCs build institutions that speak to such a wide range of consumers?

The second lesson I learned was the value of making Judaism accessible. With a reservation, kosher food is available in any restaurant throughout Disney. Without pre-booking it's available in certain easy to find stores. Our hotel had "Shabbat rooms" on the ground floor with hard, rather than electronic keys. As soon as I approached the front desk on Friday afternoon, the concierge knew what I was looking for. He drove the conversation – avoiding the awkward explanation of the Jewish Sabbath I have so often tried to supply to puzzled hotel staff.

How can we make Judaism more accessible? What are the barriers to full engagement and how can we lower them? How can we make kosher food and Shabbat observance as easy outside the Magic Kingdom as it is within?

Finally, Disney is all about celebration. Everyone is celebrating every day. Guests wear buttons announcing their celebration of a birthday, graduation, marriage or anniversary. Disney staff ask what you're celebrating, and every day is concluded with fireworks. Disney has discovered the secret that people enjoy celebrating.

As Jews, I find that we are experts at mourning and solemnity, but often struggle to celebrate. It's time for us to celebrate more. I don't mean more lavish bar mitzvah parties, but greater excitement in prayer, holiday celebrations beyond Chanukah and Purim, and Israel festivities that shift the focus away from the political. Judaism has much to celebrate, and it's important for us to bring that vibrancy to life and thus engage more people through celebration.

Disney was not our first vacation choice. Both this trip and the last were brought about by external factors. I liken our vacation to marginally affiliated Jews who come to shul for a bar mitzvah or High Holiday services. Unlike many of their experiences, however, we were captivated, welcomed like old friends and encouraged to return. Perhaps it's time to bring the lessons of Mickey and Minnie into our communities.

The gift of life

The Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation is a bone marrow, blood stem cell and umbilical cord blood registry.

A simple cheek swab is required to register to donate bone marrow. After the swab, the applicant's information is stored in a database and he or she is notified if a match is found.

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

The odds against becoming a bone marrow donor for a non-related recipient are astronomical. For this reason, many people who register just remain names on a list.

In 2004, the York University chapter of the Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity set up a booth on the York campus to register potential bone marrow donors. The Gift of Life Foundation is associated with AEPi, and chapters frequently set up booths like this one. This particular time, in 2004, Jeremy Braverman, who was then a second-year student, decided to register.

Fast forward to 2010 and Braverman received an e-mail from Gift of Life to tell him that he may be a match for a 15-year-old girl with leukemia. Even though there is no obligation to donate, Braverman fulfilled what he believed to be his duty and he agreed to donate.

Braverman is currently in New York awaiting his chance to donate to save this young girl's life. The astonishing aspect about this is that Braverman has no ties to this young girl. In fact, he may never meet her. His only opportunity to meet her would be, with her consent, after a year of his donating bone marrow.

Possibly saving one life would be enough of a story, but Braverman's doesn't stop here. He, in conjunction with the foundation, has set up a blog and Facebook page that aim to get more donors. So far he has 25 sponsored donors, he has sent out 15 test kits and raised $200 in donations.

Braverman has teamed up with Jay Feinberg, the executive director and founder of the Gift of Life Foundation, to send out the donation kits free of charge. Normally, the cost of one of these kits is about $54. For more information about donating and Braverman's story, visit his blog at jeremygol.blogspot.com. He also has a Facebook group, Jeremy's Gift of Life Drive.

Who would have thought this whole undertaking would have started with Braverman's fraternity ties to the York chapter of Alpha Epsilon Pi? This is just another example of the type of philanthropic events AEPi is engaged in.

Braverman would go on to become the president of the York chapter of the Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity after registering with Gift of Life.

"Registering to donate bone marrow is like entering the lottery. The odds are one in a million that you'll win, but if you do win, your prize is you get the opportunity to actually save someone's life," he says. "And if you don't win, you still helped to save a life and you can still win later on." After all, it took six years before he was matched.

Prejudice can't stand

The continuing saga of ethnic segregation in the religious girls school of Immanuel, in the West Bank, becomes even more entrenched and complex by the day.

Apparently there now exists a serious and ominous rift within Chinuch Atzmai, the umbrella group that oversees this institution.

You may remember the school's blatant segregation of its student body along Ashkenazi and Sephardi lines. The case came before the Israeli Supreme Court, which confirmed the discriminatory nature of the situation, condemned it and mandated that it cease by having all the girls integrated into a single stream.

The school's response was to circumvent the court order by means of a rather silly ruse: ethnic discrimination would stop, but the divide would remain, and one stream would serve chassidic girls while the other would serve non-chassidic girls. This was followed by the court's predictable rejection of this ruse and a now-infamous fine – a crippling one, based on daily compounding sums levied against the school, which is now in contempt of court.

Leading rabbis of the Lithuanian yeshiva establishment seemed to side with the courts. At the same time, other rabbis and executives of Chinuch Atzmai broke rank with their traditional rabbinic advisers, claiming that this was a highly unusual, sensitive and precedent-setting case with innumerable and unacceptable future ramifications for state interference in a matter of a private and separate school system (albeit one totally financed by the government).

In the interim, for Ashkenazi girls who couldn't tolerate being in the close and confining quarters of a classroom in the company of the Sephardi girls whom they perceive as their spiritual inferiors, a rogue pirate school was established.

The court disallowed this, as it did the busing of the Ashkenazi students to other schools. The court then decided to impose a fine on each of the parents of these students for every day that a child is absent from school.

Then the Supreme Court judges proceeded to outdo themselves. They ruled on an automatic two-week incarceration for contempt for all parents not abiding by their judgment to send their daughters to the single-stream school.

This last ruling has enraged and polarized the haredi public. In court, it was received by a spontaneous outbreak of song by chassidic fathers, the words of which – security could not succeed in silencing them – expressed how doers of good will eventually prevail over doers of evil. The deputy minister of education has stated that if the jailing proceeds, he'll move his offices to the jailhouse gates. A mass rally was also organized, busing in people from all over Israel who opposed the ruling.

The Rebbe of Slonim (the great majority of the Chassidim are his followers) has said: "If we must, we will leave Immanuel [but not have our daughters in this integrated school]. If we do leave, we shall do so wearing our Shabbat finery and amid song."

In the foggy midst of this sad resurfacing of ethnic tensions, I wish to make two points clear: first, we categorically deplore and won't tolerate – and indeed rigorously, and always legitimately, fight – discrimination, wherever it may appear.

Having said that, I wish to also make it clear that in no democracy would a court mandate, under the threat of physical and monetary pain, which school its citizens should send their children to.

I support the Chassidim's right to educate their children as they see fit, be it in the school in question, a new school or even in no school (by home schooling), but I won't allow an elitist or triumphalist attitude to pollute the honour and unity of the Jewish people.

As such, I support the court against the Chassidim in this affront to Jewish and human-rights sensitivities. At the same time, I deplore the court's activism as being legally questionable and inconsistent with democracy and religious freedoms. May HaShem guide us all on a path toward shalom.

Young teacher aims for 'fun atmosphere' in class

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In Grade 9 and again in Grade 11, Jenna Greenbloom spent her Sundays teaching children to ski. But this past year, the Grade 12 student at the Toronto Prep School spent her Sundays teaching Hebrew and Judaic studies at Habonim Hebrew School, which has been known since last month as the Jewish Heritage School @ Congregation Habonim.

The supplementary school is affiliated with Congregation Habonim, an unaffiliated, egalitarian, liberal synagogue.

Principal Sarah Margles told The CJN that Greenbloom, 17, has a very strong Jewish identity that manifests in "a very gentle way." As well, Margles said, Greenbloom is "fun and friendly, and full of good ideas."

Greenbloom's Jewish identity has been shaped significantly, in part, by spending two years in Israel – the first at age 14, when her mother, a neurologist, was on sabbatical in Herzliyah; and the second in Grade 10, when she spent a year studying at Mosenzon High School in Hod Hasharon as part of Israel's Elite Academy program for students from the Diaspora.

"They are our teachers..."

As well, Greenbloom – who plans to make aliyah in August and join the IDF in November – is a leader in the Habonim Dror Labour Zionist youth movement, as is her fellow Jewish Heritage School teacher Ya'el Friedlander.

Greenbloom, who grew up as part of the First Narayever Congregation, is an alumna of Bialik Hebrew Day School, and spent a year at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto before going to Israel to study.

She returned here at her parents' request because of a lengthy teachers' strike there at the time.

Her multiple Jewish involvements – including Camp Gesher, Torah High at the Village Shul, and serving as president of NCSY's Jewish culture club at her school – have enabled her to draw on both the cultural and religious aspects of Judaism.

Although she had a lot of experience working with children – she was a shadow for three youngsters with disabilities – Greenbloom admits she was "kind of nervous" when she took on the teaching position at Habonim.

[Frances Kraft photo]

Writing lesson plans was new to her, and a fellow Camp Gesher counsellor gave her feedback on them for the first few weeks. Also, she added, Margles was very helpful.

"I like to be very prepared," Greenbloom said.

In her classroom, Greenbloom tries to create "a fun atmosphere" by incorporating games and ensuring that her lessons are interactive.

Greenbloom, who attended Northern Secondary School before Toronto Prep opened, enjoys math, and was considering an engineering career until last year. Now she's thinking about other possibilities, given how much she likes working with children.

"I don't really know yet," she said.

"They are our teachers..." will return in the fall

A lesson from the teacher: "I try to make all the classes interactive and fun, so [students] will enjoy learning."

Max Guttmann golf tournament continues to improve lives

Annual event benefits students with learning disabilities

By Daniel Horowitz

Fortunately for the parents of children with special needs, the late Max Guttmann believed that no child should ever be left behind. And, in continuing to honour their late father's philosophy, sons Craig and Sean are preparing for the 11th annual Max Guttmann Memorial Golf Tournament.

The tournament, which swings into action on Tuesday, August 31 at Pheasant Run Golf Club, is raising funds for Grades 5-8 special education classes at Associated Hebrew Schools, which is serving former She'arim students, with learning disabilities. This specialized educational program is funded by UJA Federation. Proceeds from the tournament will ensure the continuation of high quality, customized education for children who have special learning needs.

In its previous ten years of operation, the tournament has raised more than $500,000 in support of Jewish children with learning disabilities.

Chairs of this year's tournament are Susan Eklove, Shelli Koenigsberg and Richie Stoll, all of whom are also the parents of children attending the special education program.

"My 12-year-old son Ilan is at Associated and he has never been happier and more successful in school than he is today," said Eklove. "He enjoys being part of a larger school, taking regular art and gym classes with children from the regular stream. He goes out for enriched math and creative writing. The children have a beautiful facility with new technology such as laptops and smart boards. My husband and I recently went to the school to see the children present their own Power Point presentation on their family heritage. For most of these kids, now in Grade 6 and 7, this was the first time they had stood up in front of a group of people to give an oral report. The amount of creativity that the teacher encouraged from the kids was astounding, as was the quality of their work. The positive atmosphere was electric."

According to Eklove, who is also a Special Education teacher, the model adopted for the former She'arim students at Associated is an ideal one.

"The kids benefit from having all of the resources at Associated, a diverse peer group, and classes which our kids can integrate into for the parts that they are able to," said Eklove. "Conversely, if the host school has a child that is having a tremendous amount of trouble in a particular subject, they too can put a child into the class for that topic. This also helps the kids socialize and builds bridges between the groups. Hopefully we can expand this program to more children as the "jewel in the crown" of the Toronto Jewish Education system, something to be very, very proud of."

The tournament will include a barbecue, refreshments, contests, dinner, silent auction, awards ceremony, and much, much more.

For more information, or to register, visit www.maxguttmannmemorial.org or call Elena Livertovsky at 416.635.2883 #5329.

Sean Guttmann (l) and brother Craig (3rd from the left) enjoy last year's Max Guttmann Memorial Golf Tournament for Special Education. This year's tournament takes place on Tuesday, August 31.

Koffler Centre of the Arts brings Elon Gold's one-man show to Toronto

By Daniel Horowitz

What Al Gore is to global warming, Elon Gold is to global kvetching.

Well, that's what it says on his website, and with an introduction like that, how can anyone resist what promises to be a memorable night of laughter and lunacy as the Koffler Centre of the Arts welcomes Gold and the Toronto premier of his new one-man show, Half Jewish, Half Very Jewish.

With a personal, offbeat take on his religion and culture, Half Jewish, Half Very Jewish debuted at Just For Laughs in Montreal to a sold out extended run.

Gold, one of the world's fastest-rising comics, is also a regular correspondent for The Tonight Show with Jay Leno and has worked with some of the biggest names in comedy including Dana Carvey and the legendary Mary Tyler Moore.

This exclusive event will feature an on-stage Q & A with Gold and Canada's Comedy Queen, Debra DiGiovanni (from Last Comic Standing and MuchMusic's Video on Trial), a post-show reception that's half Jewish, half very Jewish and lots of fun for all.

"Elon Gold's show is a terrific and hilarious look at modern Judaism," said Mark Breslin, the founder of Yuk Yuk's, the largest chain of comedy clubs in Canada, and the Honourary Committee Chair of this event. "He's like Jackie Mason, but half the age and twice as current."

Proceeds from the night support the Koffler Centre of the Arts - a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto agency.

The Koffler is Toronto's leading Jewish cultural institution with a broad mandate to serve all, presenting a wide range of artistic programs through a global lens in a specifically Canadian context.

Elon Gold

As the Koffler builds a new 40,000 square foot facility on Sherman Campus on Bathurst Street, north of Sheppard Avenue, it is presenting a series of multi-disciplinary cultural events and exhibitions all around the city of Toronto designed to build bridges with other communities.

"We're thrilled to be the exclusive presenter of the opening night performance of Elon Gold's show at the Toronto Just for Laughs Festival," said Lori Starr, executive director, Koffler Center of the Arts, and vice president, culture, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "This is our summer fundraiser, and tickets are only $75 each – the funds go towards making sure the Koffler can keep presenting top-notch performing arts programs around the city, including comedy."

Half Jewish, Half Very Jewish comes to Toronto's Berkeley Street Theatre (26 Berkeley Street) on Tuesday, July 6th at 7:00 pm. Tickets are $75.00

To order tickets, visit www.ticketweb.ca or call ticket web at 1.888.222.6608. For more about the Koffler Centre of the Arts, visit www.kofflerarts.org

Kachol Lavan goes back to two campuses

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Kachol Lavan, the Centre for Hebrew and Israel studies, will reopen its south campus this fall, on Sundays only, and offer two high school credit courses at its northern location, which is open three days a week.

The high school courses, Hebrew and drama, came about as the result of a parent survey conducted last year, school principal Ariel Zaltzman told The CJN.

Last year, the supplementary school, which had grown to serve more than 200 students in its first half-dozen years, was housed solely at Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill campus.

About 20 students, of the 34 who originally attended the southern location at Bialik Hebrew Day School before it closed last year, were bused north from Bialik.

"Our families that started [there] wanted us to keep this campus," said Zaltzman.

As well, he added, although most of the families that sent their children to the school's southern location were Israelis living in Toronto on a temporary basis, "we realized that many Canadian families are looking for a program that teaches the Hebrew language, teaches about Israel, and teaches about the Jewish holidays, but not from a religious aspect – more from a cultural, even secular, one."

As of last week, the school had 30 students signed up for the coming year at the Bialik site, and 200 at the Leo Baeck location.

In addition to its regular classes, the Leo Baeck site offers programs such as arts and crafts, Hebrew for adults and choir for adults. In its classes, Kachol Lavan uses Israeli texts and adapted language programs that are used in Israel.

In addition to students from the GTA's Israeli community, Kachol Lavan has 30 children from non-Israeli families.

The school, which began as an independent venture, now operates as a joint initiative of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, its Schwartz/Reisman Centre, and the Israeli Forum.

ג'ונתן כ"ץ-ילד מופלץ

אירוע "נשמת הקהילה" היה ערב מרגש ומצמ ללב, שמי מאות רבות של בני הקהילה הישראלית המתכנסי לחגוך בשמייה המבורכת של מרכז חב"ד, לחלוק כבוד לראש עיריית ונתן ולשרוש. דני מאיר, ולהודות לרב לבדא, איש צמא שמשקק ימים ולילות באהבת חינם.

אבל היה בשרב הקסום הזה אירוע אחד שלא השאיר עין יבשה אחת באולם, כשלבנה מלה ילד בן שלוש עשרה, ג'ונתן כ"ץ, וסיפר את סיפורו. ג'ונתן נולד כפג בשדרום השמי לניריון. כשיד אחיו התאום נמצא תוך כמה שבועות, ניכאי הרופאים שג'ונתן , אם ישאר בחיים, יהיה מוגבל בהתפתחותו הנפשית והשכלית.

בניגוד לכל הציפיות, ג'ונתן הוא ילד מחונן, שלקראת בר הצמוה שלו החליט שכל מתנות האירוע ייאספו לקרן למילחמה בסרטן, כשהוא מקוה לצמצ מכמה של שכמה עשר אלף דולאר, שמהם כבר ניים כשישה עשר אלף. בהצמה לסיפורו- גילה במלוך הערב עוד אלפים דולאר לקניית הספר, ולקראת סוף הערב הודיע ראש עיריית ונתן כי קרן ציבורית שבניהולו תוסיף עוד ארבעה אלפים דולאר, לאפשר לג'ונתן לעמוד את המכסה שהציב לעצמו.

היה משהו ספונטאני ומאוד ניגע ללב בדרך שכמה נפי צמים הפעים הזיע קהילה גדולה לפעות יחד, לתת יחד.

ביטוי "ישאר כוח" נזכרה לנמיד של ג'ונתן, עינת וד"ר אודי כ"ץ, על שהפעידו את זיו כולנו בילד שכזה.

הרצאנות הפוליטית

לפני שבועיים הצמתי עם הפוד שלי מצגת שהציגה על פעמת ראש ממשלת פורקיה על ה"רצאנות הישראלית", והתכידה לצילם את רצאנות של הפורקים כלפי הארצמים.

בתגובה לכך כתב לי דודהן דקל את המייל הבא:

"לא ברור לי מה הפעם בהצגת מצגת על פעפיה של פורקיה. האם פעפי עבר של ממשלת פורקיה לפני כמאה שנה ניתנים הצדקה כלשהי למעשים של ישראל, או של אדפוני צרם אחר כיום? האם כדאי לנו לפידד שנאה כלפי פורקיה, אחד מהמצים הידידותיים ביותר שפגשתי במפעתי, והמדינה המפלמית הכפעם יחידה שהתמכה בישראל? האם אכתוב פיכים להאשים את פורקיה במעשי העבר שלה, במקום להאשים את ישראל על מעשיה בשנים האחרונות?" ושידילי שוב כתבה כך:

"כן גידי, אבל זה בכלל לא הפריע לישראל לבנל יחסים הדוקים ביותר עם פורקיה עד היום, אז זה לא לעניין להעלות את זה. גם אני חשבתי על זה כל הזמן עד שהתברר לי שיש בו אילה חוסר הגיון להעלות את הליכלוך שלהם כשמתארם לנו ולשאשא אותי מתתת לשטיח כשלא מתאים לנו."

מעט השלום - יהודה פרידמן

כמה קל לשבת בחדר ממוזג עם מדיני בידו אמת ויית בשפיט, ובין לגימה לגישה לכתוב גם כמה שורות על המצע שמציע בלב יום בין אנשי קיבוצי ישראלים לשחורי שלום בינלאומיים, בהנחת פורקים יקרים, שכל מה שמעניין אותם בזירם זה להביא סיד לאזם מזכרים.

נכון שנצרכה קבלת פנים חמה לישראלים שנלשו אל פיפון אבית מהליקופטרים מרחפים, שם פגשו מעמד כבוד פורקי המרם באולות ברזל, סכינים, ברזינים, רפ'שרים חמים יותר. נכון גם שהישראלים היו מצוידים ביותר צבע "קטלנים", וליותר ביעותן, באקדחים ששלחו השנה פורקים לפגש 648 בתולות ליד מעין הזיים. בלי להכנס לפרטים מיותרים נפליא שעשה-הביעותן הציתי לא נתן הדיאה לאפשי הפגידת האומים להפידע בין אפיות השלום למזימים (פרשלנים) שידומים את האפיות ליצים המכסף, והסיע יחד עם המפיעים היה שב לנצלי המרצא בעזרת ספיגת גיר. וכל אדם ישראלים שחפש דכאון בעיקבות המבצע, יזמפש נא סיבה אפית להיות מדוכאים. למשל מילים שנרשמים על שדידות, או דילים שמנרגים בזמן מילוי הפקידם כדי שהמדוכאים ישפ בפקם בלילות, ויהיו מדוכאים ביפים.

על כן, אנחי אלפיים שנה שהיתי אחד לצייים, הגיע הזפן של הצייים להיות אחד ליהודים ואנחי נהיה אחד לעצמנו ובזה כמי שאחד אפונה השלם.

Landa retires after 21 years at Associated

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For the past year, Arthur Landa, executive director of Associated Hebrew Schools, has felt nostalgic every time he completed an annual task.

Landa, 67, who is retiring at the end of the summer after 21 years in his job, said that after he completed negotiations with the union or presented the financial statement to the board, for example, he would think, "This is the last time I'll be doing this.

"When my son, though, asked me if I'm going to miss the beautiful people at Associated, that is when reality set in. I'm really retiring."

Arthur Landa

In an interview the morning after his retirement cocktail party, held earlier this month at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Landa said, "after last night, there is no turning back."

Last week, Associated announced that Elliott Brodkin, who has more than 30 years of financial and management experience, including more than 12 as chief financial officer of the Toronto French School, will be its new CFO/executive director.

Speaking to The CJN about his years at Associated, Landa said he has always had a strong feeling about working in the Jewish community, and making a contribution to Jewish continuity.

A native of Montreal and a graduate of social work from McGill University, he began his career at that city's YMHA and went on to become executive director of the Jewish Federation of Nashville.

He had been living in Toronto for several years when his late wife, Eva, then director of finance at Jewish Family & Child Service, heard that Associated was seeking an executive director. "The rest is history," he said.

Jewish education was another challenge to him. "It represented another approach to do what I always wanted to do."

Early on in his career at Associated, he said, it was evident that the demography of the Jewish community was changing. "The days of [Associated's former Leslie Street campus] were numbered, because the Jewish community was shrinking in that area.

"From time to time, the Jewish community moves away from the Bathurst corridor, but then it moves back. The Leslie campus [just south of Steeles Avenue] had 1,000 students for 20 years. That's a big thing."

Associated also knew that a large number of Jews were moving to the city of Vaughan, and "we began talking about putting up a building in Thornhill. When the Kamin Education Centre opened in 1995, we served 1,100 kids, and the building was meant to hold 800. Now, we're coming back to the size we first intended."

Currently, Associated has three campuses: the Kamin Education Centre; the Posluns Education Centre on Neptune Drive, which was was rebuilt in 1998; and the rebuilt Hurwich Education Centre, which houses the Danilack Middle school (on Finch Avenue).

"Over the span of my career, virtually every campus was renovated or built. It was part of our initiative to meet the changing demographics."

Landa said that he also saw a reshuffling of educational services. "We recognized that the school had to move toward child-centred learning, and we created centres so we could serve students who needed remedial teaching and those who had special talents.

> 'We help teachers... recognize the abilities of each and every student'

"We help teachers provide a curriculum for students at both ends of the spectrum, so they can recognize the abilities of each and every student."

Landa praised Mark Smiley, Associated's current director of education, "for bringing the school to the cutting edge of education, both in Judaic and general studies."

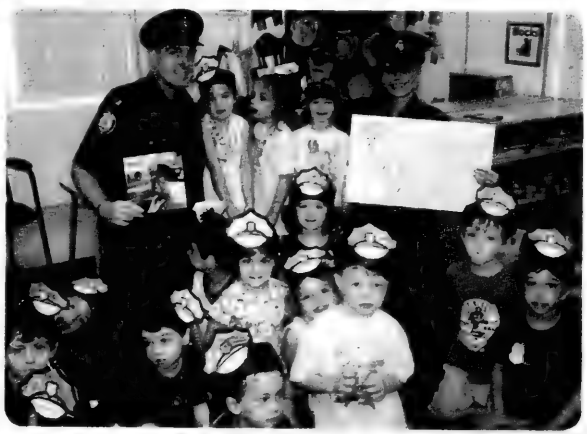
An ongoing challenge, said Landa, is supporting the more than 500 Associated students who require subsidies. "Even though we get more than $2 million from the community, it's not enough. We still have deficits, and we've been forced to do some creative fundraising. We don't want the burden to fall on full-fee parents.

"Students are never turned away because they can't pay. They're only turned away if we have no space, and that goes for full-fee students as well."

Landa said he's committed to Jewish education because of its two elements – Jewish literacy and Jewish experience. "In my view, it's not sufficient to grow up and learn solely through Jewish experience. It must be complemented by literacy, and day schools provide both."

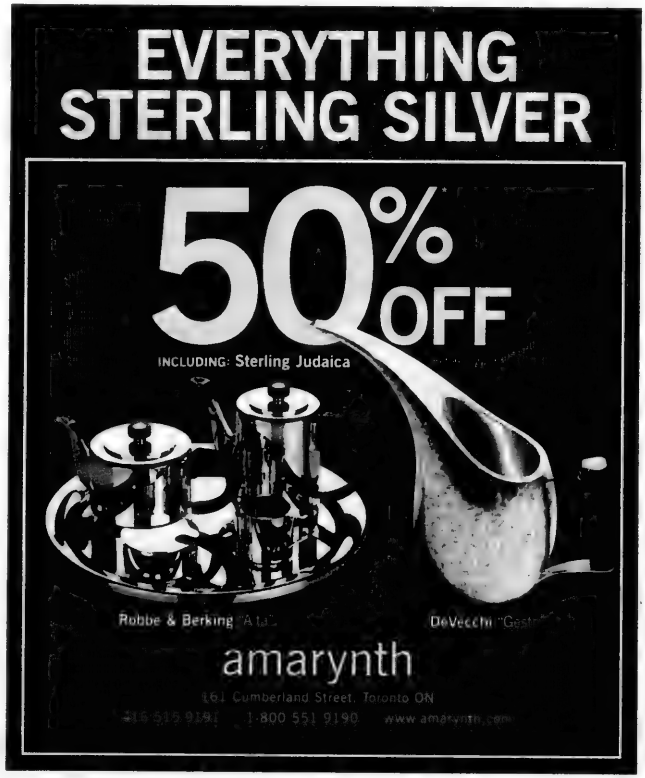
When he retires from his "16-hour a day job" he'll spend time with his five children and five grandchildren, who variously live in the United States, Israel and Toronto, and he'll return to studying classical music, "especially piano and opera."

In the speech he gave at his retirement party, Landa said that his hope is that in 100 years from now, "historians will be able to declare that Associated Hebrew School's sacred mission is still intact – that [it] was the only day school in Toronto, for the past 200 years, that accepted every child, regardless of financial stability, [and] that [it] was the only day school in Toronto committed to providing an excellent Jewish education for every child, regardless of socio-economic background, regardless of religious affiliation, spanning the Jewish spectrum from non-affiliated to the shomer Shabbat. My hope is that this wish is realized."



EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

Junior kindergarten students at Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns branch, on Neptune Drive, are seen thanking Const. Isabelle Cotton, right, and Const. Scott Mills for visiting their class last week. The children were learning about the responsibilities of a police officer and how to dial 911 in case of an emergency.



Hypocrisy evident as Turkish PM enjoys PR boost

Israel's seizure of the Turkish registered ship Mavi Marmara on May 31 thrust Turkey and its controversial prime minister, Recep Erdogan, into the international spotlight. Or perhaps it would be more accurate to say that Erdogan's – together with his senior ministers' – vitriolic verbal attacks on Israel have raised his profile dramatically.

These profiles have varied considerably in the Canadian and western media circles.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

For instance, in his June 5 National Post column dealing with the immediate rush to condemn Israel in the absence of established facts about the Marmara tragedy, Robert Fulford drew attention to rarely examined details about Turkey's hypocrisy. He wrote: "It was striking to hear that the Turkish foreign minister called the boarding of the Mavi Marmara 'an act of barbarism.' Turkey, having helped to instigate the flotilla, is a new voice in the self-righteous clamour against Israel. It still doesn't admit that it perpetrated genocide against the Armenians a century ago, it drags its distinguished authors into court for telling the truth about that atrocity and its attempt to contain the Kurdish independence movement has so far cost some 40,000 lives, mostly Kurds."

Writing from Jerusalem for the Globe and Mail (June 11) about the Turkish government's reaction, Patrick Martin argued that Erdogan's "outcry against Israel... have made him the most admired leader in the Muslim and Arab worlds, shaming those who have done so little for the Palestinians."

Precisely what Erdogan has done for the Palestinians, others would argue, is highly questionable to say the least. Erdogan's rhetorical assaults on Israel (including his tantrum in Davos in 2009 against Israeli President Shimon Peres) are no doubt popular in the Arab and Muslim worlds. But his support for Hamas (and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad) only serves to reinforce the hardships Palestinian extremists have inflicted on their own people in Gaza.

Martin paints a mostly positive picture of Erdogan, including his policy toward the Kurds: "He offered peace to the country's Kurds and an opening of relations with Turkey's historic foe, Armenia. He established good relations with Iraq and even with its Kurdish Regional Government that sits on Turkey's border."

What Martin didn't mention is that since late 2007, Erdogan's government has authorized deadly strikes into northern Iraq against Kurdish-PKK rebels operating from there in support of increased autonomy in southeastern Turkey. For instance, the BBC reported on May 3, 2008, that Turkish forces claimed in an army statement to have "neutralize[d] more than 150 [Kurdish] terrorists."

Other such attacks have resulted in scores more Kurds being killed and have prompted Iraq's government to warn Turkey about destabilizing the region.

It's no surprise, of course, that Erdogan's "outrage" against such deadly assaults on the Kurds is nowhere to be heard. And, after all, the Kurds are clamouring only for increased autonomy, including language rights to be enshrined in the constitution, not any longer for self-rule, which is prohibited and a punishable offence in Turkey.

* * *

Against a glut of uninformed, frenzied charges that Israel had committed "war crimes," "terrorism" and "piracy" in intercepting the flotilla in international waters, Ed Morgan, professor of international law at the University of Toronto, clarified the facts pertaining to what is called the Law of the Sea (Globe and Mail, June 3). He spelled out the terms according to which it's perfectly legal for Israel, being in a state of armed conflict with Hamas, to impose and enforce a naval blockade on Gaza (to prevent the smuggling of arms), including by intercepting and boarding ships that attempt to run the blockade. (His article should be read in full. It can be found at www.theglobeandmail.com/news/opinions/israels-naval-blockade-pitches-and-rolls-with-the-law-of-the-sea/article1589981.)

The Canadian Navy undertakes similar boardings on a regular basis. Between 2001 and 2003, during NATO's Operation Apollo, Canadian naval personnel made over 260 boardings in their efforts to halt the flow of terrorists and weapons through international waters in the Persian Gulf. Global News reported (April 9) on the HMCS Fredericton's boardings off the east coast of Africa mere months ago: "The boarding party, team of specially trained and heavily armed sailors, was regularly dispatched from the Fredericton to investigate skiffs and dhows [Arab sailing vessels]... often used for pirate attacks or to transport weapons and drugs."

Glace Bay, N.S., shul for sale

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

The handful of members of the Sons of Israel Synagogue in Glace Bay, N.S., are placing their building on the market.

"For the last number of years, it's only been used for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services, up until last fall when no services were held at all," says shul president Mark Chernin.

"There are only 10 congregants, of whom only a couple actually live in Glace Bay, most of the rest several miles away. I'm the youngest at 53. Fanny Cohen is the oldest at 101. It's been such a struggle to maintain the building that this is the right move."

Synagogue was opened in 1902

The synagogue was opened in 1902, housing a congregation of 140 people. The cost to build? $5,000. It was the first synagogue built for that purpose in the Maritime provinces, though other former church buildings had been obtained earlier in other communities. An additional building was erected as a community hall/school in 1928.

"We have to spend money for upkeep, and is it really worth it for three days of worship a year?" asked Chernin. "I'm certainly not for that. We do have our cemetery, and proceeds from the sale of the building will go to perpetual care. But who will even look after that once we're all gone? There is no one moving back to Glace Bay."

Most former Jewish residents, such as Lowell Shore and Arthur Zilbert, both living in Halifax, moved away from Glace Bay 40 years ago, when they entered university. Others left for social or work reasons, which have since kept them away.

Shore recalled his days in the Cape Breton community. "As a boy, I went to shul each Shabbos, helped with the davening, even pre-bar mitzvah, had 15 to 20 kids with me in Hebrew school, played on a hockey and basketball team representing the Jewish community, and softball on a field behind the shul that seemed huge to us kids but is probably like a postage stamp today."

Zilbert, who expressed disappointment that the Orthodox shul is being sold, added, "The community held together for a long time. Even when there were only 15 men, there were always services Friday night and Saturday. Now the people aren't there, the spirit isn't there.

"When I'd go back to visit, I felt a comfort at the shul, living with the memories I had as a child, memories of the great group of people I grew up with. The shul was one of warmth and happiness."

Shirley Chernin, Mark's mother, was born in Sydney, 15 kilometres away, but is a 54-year Glace Bay resident. She says the remaining people are heartbroken. "No one has the heart to tear it down, as was proposed, too, but the kindest thing is to sell it. Yet who will buy it? Churches are closing here, too. If anyone buys it, it will be probably be torn down and turned into apartments."

She says the building is unique "with its centre bimah, upstairs seating, and a mechitzah downstairs now that was built 40 years ago when the upstairs became hazardous." She recalls a special celebration held in 2001 that attracted 550 people from near and far. "Those who grew up here still have an attachment to the community."

Unfortunately, for the 108-year-old building, they no longer live where their roots are planted.

Jews most targeted religious group in Canada: police

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Police services across Canada recorded 1,036 incidents of hate-motivated crimes in 2008, with 165 of them targeting Jews.

People of the Jewish faith were the single most targeted religious group, far eclipsing incidents involving Catholics (30 crimes) and Muslims (26 incidents), according to a report by by Statistics Canada that were released last week.

Incidents involving Jews were up by 42 per cent in 2008 compared to the previous year, growing faster than the overall rise in hate crimes, which increased by 35 per cent from 2007 to 2008.

Those findings are similar to a recent report by the Toronto Police Service, which found that the single most targeted victim group in Toronto in 2009 – a year later than the Statistics Canada findings – was Jews.

Surveying police findings across the country, Statistics Canada reported that police found the vast majority of hate crimes were motivated by race or ethnicity (55 per cent), the victim's religion (26 per cent) and the victim's sexual orientation (16 per cent).

With 205 incidents, blacks were the single most targeted group (under the race or ethnicity category), but, "as in previous years, about two-thirds of religiously motivated hate crimes were committed against the Jewish faith," Statistics Canada said.

"Violent crimes, mainly assaults and uttering threats, accounted for 42 per cent of all hate crimes. Mischief offences such as vandalism to property accounted for 47 per cent, while other non-violent offences comprised the remaining 11 per cent," the report stated.

"Hate crimes motivated by sexual orientation were the most violent in nature. In 2008, 75 per cent of those motivated by sexual orientation were violent, compared with 38 per cent of racially motivated incidents and 25 per cent of religiously motivated incidents.

"Among violent incidents motivated by sexual orientation, 85 per cent of the victims were male."

At 6.3 incidents per 100,000 people, Vancouver and Hamilton recorded the highest rates of hate crimes among Canada's 10 largest cities. Toronto's rate of hate crimes was 5.4 per 100,000, about average for the 10 largest urban centres. Montreal reported the lowest rate, with 1 incident per 100,000.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said that "the numbers do not suggest Jews have something to worry about… The numbers are not large and we should be grateful for that."

The Statistics Canada figures "must be looked at relative to the population and relative to the work police have done to protect our community," he said.

One cause for concern was the finding that gays were the most likely group to suffer violent incidents.

"We are going to reach out to the LGBT [lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered] community to share our experience and expertise how to lessen the crimes against them," Farber said.

The Jewish community, he noted, was the first to urge actions against hate-motivated crime and has experience working with police in this area.

Two police raids on Jewish institutions in past 10 years

"The synagogue vandals are either agents of the government or following the government's not-too-subtle leadership. Either possibility should be unacceptable to Canada, and unacceptable to the international community."

Rabbi Scheier, who visited Caracas briefly a month after the incidents and has kept in regular contact with Jewish leaders there, told the committee: "The international community, led by Canada, must demand an impartial, independent, and internationally sanctioned investigation of the attacks…

"Canada enjoys diplomatic and economic ties with Venezuela. It is time to leverage this relationship, and it is time to take a principled stance."

Chavez has courted Arab world, Iran

The community now numbers 12,000, half the size it was 10 years ago, he said.

Chavez, who has openly courted the Arab world and Iran, has led the country since 1999.

"The government of Venezuela is sensitive to how it is perceived in the community of nations, and we have been reassured that the international voice of condemnation is the one ray of hope for the future of political and religious freedom in Venezuela," Rabbi Scheier stated.

These attacks were not the first since Chavez came to power. Rabbi Scheier noted that in 2004 and 2007, there were two police raids on Jewish communal institutions, one a school.

"The alleged purpose of the raid was to search for weapons and contraband. The real purpose of the raid was to demonstrate that the Jewish community, and all who support Israel, are unwelcome in Venezuela," according to what Rabbi Scheier has been told by Venezuelan Jews. The searches turned up nothing.

The government denied any involvement in the 2009 attacks, and 11 suspects, including seven police officers, were arrested, but Rabbi Scheier terms this "a façade of justice."

"There have been no trials, and the Jewish community has been left in the dark as to the sentence or the fate of those allegedly apprehended for these crimes."

Relations between the South American country and Israel soured during Israel's war with Hezbollah in Lebanon in 2006. The Venezuela government cut diplomatic ties with Israel after its conflict with Hezbollah in Gaza in December 2008-January 2009.

Rabbi Scheier thanked Parliament for the support it has shown for the Venezuelan Jewish community through motions tabled, petitions presented and especially Canada's "courageous" gesture of representing Israel's consular interests since its ambassador was expelled in January of last year.

Rabbi Scheier read letters he had received from Jewish children fearful of the anti-Semitism they believe has been whipped up by Chavez since the war in Gaza.

After Israel's interception of the flotilla headed to Gaza May 31, Rabbi Scheier said Chavez launched into a "diatribe," accusing Israel of financing his opposition, the Mossad of sending assassination teams to Venezuela, and deploying its forces in the Caribbean.

He quoted Chavez as saying: "Curse you, State of Israel, curse you, you terrorist and murder."

Chavez's words are similar to those that the vandals wrote on the walls of the synagogue in January 2009," he noted, causing Jews to be afraid not only for their institutions' security, but their personal safety.

Rabbi Scheier stressed the urgency of the situation. "If we wait too long, one of two eventualities will occur – either every Jew will flee the country, or further tragedy will befall the country."

Rabbi Scheier spent 24 hours in Caracas in March 2009 with Rabbis Avi Weiss of New York and Shmuel Herzfeld of Washington, D.C., both leaders of Amcha – The Coalition of Jewish Concerns. They were invited by Venezuela's chief Ashkenazi rabbi Pynchas Brener, who pleaded with the visitors to make the plight of the community known to the outside world and to urge their governments to intervene.

Apology rejected by Liberal MP

In response to queries from The CJN, Davies' office said she was "not available" for comment.

In a June 15 statement, Bob Rae, Liberal MP for Toronto Centre, rejected Davies' apology and said her original interview comments were "not the off-the-cuff ramblings of [just] any ill-informed or biased person." He said that as deputy leader of a national political party, she was "fully cognizant of her responsibilities" when she stated that Israel has been occupying territories since 1948.

"The logical implication of these comments is that Israel has no right to exist. This rhetoric is responsible for more than 'confusion,' and an 'inadvertent error.' The appropriate decision, is for Mr. Layton to ask for her resignation as deputy leader and for Ms. Davies to issue an apology to all Canadians. Nothing short of that will do," Rae said.

Bob Rae

Preceding her appearance onstage at the anti-Israel rally, Katz's video showed organizers exhorting the crowd with chants of "Long Live Palestine! Long Live the Intifadah!" and praising Davies as a politician who "wears the keffiyah."

They also contrasted her to Harper, who was called a politician that "welcomes war criminals" into Canada, a reference to late-May visit to Ottawa by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Davies then took the microphone and addressed the crowd, saying Harper should stand up and fight to "end the siege of Gaza and this so-called friendship with Israel."

She said after a recent visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories, she now understands the "worldwide movement" against the "illegal occupation of Palestinian lands… it is inhumane. It is illegal."

In the wake of the comments, the CIC offered to lead Layton and other NDP members on an informational tour of Israel.

New Birthright trip aimed at Russian Jews

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Maria Grinev will be having a very Russian summer.

In Israel.

Grinev is one of 20 Canadians who will be going on the first Canadian Taglit-Birthright Israel trip designed specifically for Russian Jews, called the CIE Canadian Russian Adventure.

The trip, which runs from July 11 to 22, will have 20 participants from Canada and 20 from St. Petersburg, all of whom will be travelling with Russian Jewish soldiers from the Israel Defence Forces.

For Grinev, the trip is a chance to merge two cultures, something she's been struggling with since she immigrated to Israel from Russia when she was six, and then to Canada when she was 11.

"It's too much for a child to learn both Hebrew and Russian and go to the synagogue and keep track of Russian events," Grinev, 22, said. "I did feel like a little bit of an outcast [in the Toronto Jewish community]."

That's why, about a year ago, Grinev, who's going into her fourth year at York University in psychology, joined Jewski, a Hillel group for Russian Jews who don't quite fit into the Canadian Jewish community.

"[At Jewski events], I really did feel like I'm [involved] in the Jewish community. I didn't feel like I'm not Jewish enough," Grinev said.

Alona Geysman, who plans Russian Jewish programming at Hillel, is helping to organize both Jewski and the Israel trip.

"The idea came to me because I looked at my own background," said Geysman, who was born in Ukraine and immigrated to Israel, and then to Canada, before she turned 12. "What happens is a lot of [Russian immigrants] put their Russian identity on the backburner in order to adapt and blend into Canadian society... we become Canadianized."

Maria Grinev

The trip will give Canadian Russian Jews the opportunity to connect with others like them, as well as with Israel.

"It's definitely going to be the same itinerary as any Birthright Israel trip. We'll have a Russian-speaking tour guide and will probably talk a little bit more about Russian-Israeli culture," said Geysman, who will be leading the trip.

Geysman organized the trip with the help of people from a Hillel in St. Petersburg, as well as with the Canada-Israel Experience, which approved the idea in January.

"My participants are really excited. They think it's really cool to meet people exactly like them, but from different cultures," Geysman said. "It's really great if we can create friendships during this trip."

Lior Cyngiser, CIE's madrichim co-ordinator, hopes the trip will inspire participants to get involved in their local Jewish community. "We're using Birthright Israel as a vehicle not only to make connections between Russia and Toronto, but to make connections to the Toronto community itself," he said, adding that this can be done through events and programming for Birthright alumni.

"Through the work with Alona and her relationship with Hillel, we're able to introduce this new group into the larger community."

Cyngiser sees the trip as a way to explore three different cultures and perspectives.

"[The Canadian Russian Jewish population] will be able to be more comfortable about sharing their cultural backgrounds and, at the same time, will realize how much they have in common with Jewish Russian Israelis and Jews from Russia," he said. "This trip will hit different personal and cultural key points that a regular trip wouldn't have."

CFJS' new board to further Israel advocacy

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

As the president of Israel on Campus at McMaster University, Rebecca Cherniak wanted a louder voice. So she went national.

Cherniak, who's in McMaster's arts and science program, is the new incoming vice-president for the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students, a group that encourages Jewish identity and Israel advocacy programming on campuses across Canada. Cherniak joined CFJS last year and served as its chair of Israel affairs and advocacy.

"I saw the great potential of a national body," she said. "CFJS can connect student leaders from Dalhousie University [in Halifax] to Victoria. Without that framework, students from across the country wouldn't be able to communicate as effectively as they do."

Cherniak is one of five newly elected members of the CFJS's executive board, which was chosen by students across Canada. The board recently finished appointing board members for positions such as its new political engagement chair Ilan Mann of York University and communications chair Ashley Faintuch of the University of Winnipeg.

This year, the CFJS ran initiatives such as the Size Doesn't Matter campaign, which worked to raise awareness about Israel through a speaker series, multimedia content and a website, as well as a symposium that connected Canadian students to students at Spertus College in Chicago.

This upcoming year, Cherniak would like the CFJS become more of a grassroots organization and better represent local Jewish groups

"We can't replace... the local member organizations... but [the CFJS] provides that crucial and unique national aspect that local organizations can't get on their own," she said. "We need to make sure that the national voice is representative of the [local] member organizations."

CFJS plans to do this through its advisory board, comprising leaders of Jewish campus groups across Canada. The board will meet three times a year, with its first meeting slated for the end of this month.

Aaron Vomberg, the incoming CFJS president, would like to see more Israel advocacy programming as well as stronger partnerships with organizations such as the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and non-Jewish organizations such as First Nations communities.

Samantha Banks (left) and Rebecca Cherniak

Vomberg, who is going into his fourth year in Dalhousie's urban planning program, joined the CFJS three years ago.

"I became involved on the national level with the goal of increasing both the amount of [Israel] advocacy that was occurring and also to increase the amount of identity-based social justice programming," said Vomberg, who was president of Dalhousie's Jewish student association.

"When students come together, they have the ability to make that difference on a much larger scale."

Samantha Banks, the past president of the CFJS and a future Humber College student, sees the group as a support system for Jewish students throughout Canada.

"Our goal is to help students, to be there as a friend or a mentor and to provide information and resources and websites that can further their local campus and Jewish involvement," she said.

"CFJS is an umbrella organization, but we're also the... abba and ima to the local campuses. All we want to see is the local campus prosper."

The group plans to do that through more trips, which include two possible initiatives in New York and Los Angeles, and more social networks that would allow students to connect with professionals in their prospective fields, Vomberg said.

For Banks, CFJS' success can be measured in the number of students that applied for positions on the board this year.

"To be quite honest, I think we really gave CFJS a good reputation this year," she said.

UC Irvine suspends Muslim Student Union

JTA

IRVINE, Calif. — The University of California, Irvine suspended a Muslim student group over its disruption of a lecture by Israel's ambassador to the United States.

In a May 27 letter to the Muslim Student Union released June 14 by the university, the student affairs disciplinary committee announced that after an investigation, it found the group guilty of violating certain sections of the university's policies applying to campus activities, organizations and students, including disorderly conduct and obstructing university activities.

During a Feb. 8 speech at the university sponsored by a campus pro-Israel group, Ambassador Michael Oren repeatedly was heckled and interrupted. Eleven students were arrested in the incident.

The disciplinary committee, based on evidence found on social networking sites and personal observation, found that "The disruptions were planned, orchestrated and coordinated in advance by the Muslim Student Union."

The student group has been suspended for one year, beginning Sept. 1, and will be subject to a one-year probation upon its reinstatement. The members of the group also will be required to perform a collective 50 hours of community service.

The student union has appealed the decision and asserts that it did not co-ordinate the protest, according to reports.

The university released the decision after the Jewish Federation of Orange County (JFOC) filed a freedom of information request, the Orange County Register reported.

"The university's disciplinary action regarding the MSU establishes an important and appropriate precedent and sends a powerful message to other universities across the nation," said Shalom Elcott, JFOC's president and CEO.

The Zionist Organization of America, which has for years tracked incidents of hostility against Jews on Irvine's campus, praised the decision.

"This is a historic step that sends a message to all universities to not tolerate dangerous bigotry against Jews on campus," Morton Klein, ZOA's president, told JTA.

HOOPS FOR ISRAEL

Toronto's chapter of the Birthright Israel Alumni Community (BAC) held two fundraisers recently for Ethopian Israeli immigrants living in Bat Yam. Hoops 4 Israel, a basketball tournament held since 2007, raised more than $95,000 for the cause and Jam 4 Israel, the event's after party, which was held at Toronto's London Tap House on June 10, raised another $30,000. Pictured, some of the Hoops 4 Israel executive committee pose at the tournament. From left are Daniel Winberg, Eden Pollock, Aaron Collins, Erin Cohanim and Dave Goodman. Rose Reisman wants to change people's eating habits

By JENNIFER LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

Rose Reisman is busy. Besides being one of Canada's leading health and wellness experts for the past 15 years, she has penned numerous cookbooks and columns, worked as a caterer, restaurant consultant, TV and radio personality, public speaker, teacher, and corporate health and wellness consultant. She is also the mother of four children.

Resiman is a registered nutritional consultant from the Canadian School of Natural Nutrition, and holds several university degrees, including a BA and an MBA from York University and a B.Ed. from the University of Toronto.

Surprisingly, despite all her culinary achievements Reisman does not have any traditional culinary training. "I had young children and I didn't want to work full time. I always had a mind for marketing, but I hadn't really found my true passion until one day, I discovered cooking."

In 1988 Reisman self-published her first cookbook, and soon after, she realized that she wanted to be part of the growing healthy eating and living movement.

"I have a family history of obesity and diabetes. Some of my family's members died in their 50s – I just couldn't stand back and not do anything. In 1993 when I found out I had high cholesterol, I knew it was time to make a serious change."

In 1993, Reisman published her first book on healthy eating – Rose Reisman Brings Home Light Cooking. It sold over 400,000 copies and set Reisman off on her path of trying to change the way people eat.

Following the success of a number of cookbooks, Reisman launched Rose Reisman Catering – The Art of Eating Well, in 2004. The company provides delicious and light meals for social events at a variety of Toronto venues.

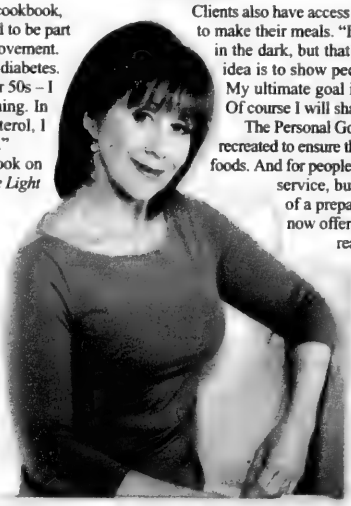
"We cater weddings, dinner parties and every other event in between. Our creative menus and professional expertise keep even the fussiest clients happy – healthy eating has never tasted so good."

Rose Reisman Catering also serves over 400 corporate clients on a daily basis. "The health of a company's employees is the basis of its productivity. Investing in their health – by having us provide them with a healthy lunch – is the easiest way to help them reach their goals."

In 2008, Reisman decided to take her healthy eating expertise into people's homes. "People would always say to me, 'Rose, if I could eat food like yours every day I would lose weight.' That's when I got the idea to start Personal Gourmet – to help busy people eat well."

Personal Gourmet is a meal delivery service that's custom-designed to meet the unique requirements of each client, offering two or three meals plus snacks daily. The meals are properly balanced with the four major food groups, based on the Canada Food Guide. "It's good food for busy people."

Reisman developed the meal plans with Dr. David Macklin, one of Canada's leading weight management physicians. Together, they have ensured that the food program is healthy and delicious.



Clients also have access to all the recipes Reisman uses to make their meals. "It would be easy to keep people in the dark, but that's not the point of all this. The idea is to show people that eating well is simple. My ultimate goal is to get people cooking again. Of course I will share my recipes."

The Personal Gourmet menu is constantly being recreated to ensure that clients are always trying new foods. And for people who don't need a daily delivery service, but still want to enjoy the luxury of a prepared meal, Personal Gourmet is now offering meals that are delivered and ready to be frozen.

"These are for those crazy nights, when you have to work late and drive each kid to a different place. You don't have time to cook, but you still want to make sure everyone is getting a healthy dinner."

Meals can be ordered as little as three days in advance and kept refrigerated for up to five days or frozen. "All you need to do is pop them in the oven, and in 10 minutes, you'll have a home cooked meal."

About five years ago Reisman was approached by the Pickle Barrel restaurant chain to help create a nutritionally mindful menu. She consults with the chefs every four months to come up with a different concept for its health conscious consumers. "We've done a Mediterranean menu, a Locavore menu, and one with meals under 500 calories. This is just one more way to help spread my mission of helping people take control of their diets."

Pickle Barrel's vision of offering consumers healthy options contributed to the evolution of Glow, Reisman's first restaurant. Despite a rough beginning – Glow had a fire and had to be shut down for three months just after opening – the restaurant is a huge success.

"The entire menu is really about taking foods people love and putting a healthy spin on them. Eating is a wonderful, enjoyable experience and it's not supposed to be about deprivation. We make soups without cream, serve burgers without buns and don't have a deep fryer, yet people love our food and keep coming back. You can indulge without excess fat and calories."

Despite her busy schedule, Reisman has always devoted time to supporting charities and has endorsed the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation for many years. "Breast cancer is an insidious disease and all women are terrified of it. We're all affected by it in some way." Resiman has raised over $1 million for the foundation from sales of her cookbooks.

Reisman has recently become the spokesperson for Breakfast for Learning, a leading national non-profit organization dedicated to child nutrition programs in Canada.

"Children today are going to live 10 to 15 years less than their parents. One-third of children born after the year 2000 will develop diabetes. As a mother, I had to do something and Breakfast for Learning was the perfect partnership."

In March 2010, Reisman released her latest cookbook, Rose Reisman's Family Favorites, sold at all major book retailers. In it, she delivers 270 simple, nutritional recipes for the whole family.

"The whole idea is to get families back at the table together. We all have busy schedules, but breaking bread together, even just twice a week, can be the first steps we all need to take to combat the obesity, diabetes and heart disease that is affecting all our lives. Every recipe in Family Favorites has a complete nutritional breakdown."

Janna Gur shows Israeli cuisine has come into its own

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Traditional Ashkenazi food has all but disappeared in Israel, except among the haredi communities, says one of the country's most popular food writers and commentators.

Janna Gur, editor of the Hebrew-language culinary monthly Al Hashulhan, says Israelis' eating habits have been transformed in the past 20 years.

"Up till then, there was the traditional ethnic food at home, street food like falafel and shawarma, and restaurant food that was rather pompous French or Italian, and not always well made," she said.

Israelis were, only a couple of decades ago, "culinarily challenged," she said.

Those three elements – home, street and restaurant – are now more in line, with the emphasis, even in the finest restaurants, on healthy vegetables and fruits, legumes and grains that the country produces. The favourite dishes are often updated versions of simple meals brought by non-European Jewish immigrants, or interesting tastes borrowed from Israel's Arab neighbours.

"Of the 10 or 20 leading restaurants none is French or Italian. Israeli cuisine today is a fusion of Mediterranean and Jewish ethnic," said Gur.

Heavy eastern European – and North American – fare just doesn't fit with Israel's warm, sunny climate.

Many Israeli families are now "mixed," that is, the parents may be Moroccan and Polish, or Iraqi and Hungarian, and that "cross-fertilization" has found its expression in the kitchen. And Israelis still like to cook, she added.

Gur was in Montreal recently to promote the publication in English of her first book The Book of New Israeli Food: A Culinary Journey, which sold over 30,000 copies in Israel in Hebrew. She gave a talk on the evolution of Israeli food and demonstrated a couple of creations at the Academie culinaire de Vieux-Montréal for food writers, under the sponsorship of the Israeli consulate.

Israeli food is about more than falafel nowadays, but another chick pea concoction, hummus, has become "a religion," said Gur, a striking, dark-haired woman, who was born in Latvia and is a former El Al flight attendant. She is not a trained chef, just someone who loves to cook and was exposed to good food in her travels around the world.

Israeli food writer Janna Gur breaks eggs to finish her shakshuka, a staple of North African home cooks, which has become a trendy dish in Israel.

"There are restaurants that just serve hummus," she said. "The Arabs make the best, but nowhere does hummus have the cult status that it does in Israel. No one goes out in Damascus to eat hummus."

The dip can, of course, be made at home, but she advises forgoing olive oil (the oil from the essential tahini is enough) and serving it very fresh at room temperature.

Sabich, a traditional Iraqi Shabbat breakfast dish, is now showing up as a snack at trendy espresso bars, wrapped in pita, like falafel. It is basically grilled eggplant, hard-boiled eggs, tahini, pickles and spices.

Gur said tahini, made solely of ground sesame seeds, has become "the single most important ingredient in Israeli cuisine." As a creamy dressing, it can be served on vegetarian and meat dishes, and is a pareve solution for the kosher cook. There's even tahini ice cream.

Toasted cracked green, or unripened, wheat, which has a smoky flavour, a staple among Arabs, has become a trendy side dish for Israelis, she said. Another starchy accompaniment making a comeback is the distinctly Israeli toasted couscous. According to lore, it was invented during the austerity period of the 1950s at the urging of prime minister David Ben-Gurion as a substitute for rice.

Something that hasn't changed is Israelis' love of salads. "We must be the only people who have salad for breakfast," Gur joked.

She demonstrated one of her favourites made of fennel, pistachio nuts and a bit of jalapeno pepper, dressed simply with olive oil, lemon segments and a drop of honey.

Eggplant is the most important vegetable in Israeli cuisine, she said. Gur likes it cut in half lengthwise and roasted until it's charred – no need to salt it first, she says, at least, not the ones that grow in her land. Tomatoes, herbs, greens, tahini and ceviche (fish "cooked" in an acid) are then piled on top.

Pomegranates have become synonymous with Israel, but Gur said they're not used that much. She likes a "monochromatic" salad made with the seedy fruit and its "blood" relation, the beet.

Shakshuka, which was once a typical working man's breakfast with origins in Tunisia, is now almost a delicacy in Israel. Gur showed how it's done, making a fresh tomato sauce with eggplant and spicing it with hot pepper, garlic, paprika, cumin and maybe ground caraway. Egg yolks are then broken on top of the sauce to cook.

Gur added a few slices of chèvre cheese as a gourmet touch.

As for sweets, Bulgarians have contributed a milk pudding-like dessert flavoured with rose water that can be found in many variations. Date syrup, once a staple of Iraqi Jews, has become the rage as a substitute for honey, she said. It's thinner, slightly less sweet with caramel notes, and it's cheaper than what the bees make.

While you won't easily find gefilte fish or chopped liver in Israel, one remnant of eastern Europe has been preserved: chicken soup. Gur likes to make hers with zucchini, leeks and pumpkins.

"I've been criticized [by non-Israeli food snobs] that it is not authentic," said Gur, who obviously doesn't give a fig what they think.

Internet newsletter helps you keep 'wining'

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

Wine maven Yossie Horwitz keeps his philosophy simple and upbeat: good wine is the wine you enjoy.

That's the message threading its way through the kosher wine newsletter Horwitz writes and sends out over the Internet each week, as he's been doing for several years, to a growing audience of enthusiasts.

Whether your vino palate runs from greenhorn to sophisticated, the e-newsletter is aimed at anyone with a consuming interest in kosher wine, from what's new and affordable to what pairs well with seasonal and Jewish holiday foods (even greasy latkes).

"There's been an explosion of interest in kosher wine, dovetailing with an increase in availability," says Horwitz, a New York lawyer for whom a glass of the grape with dinner is enjoyment, but also homework, yielding many of the choices discussed in his weekly electronic missive. "But [consumers] are still boxed in by preconceived notions of what is good or not."

Addressing his audience in a folksy style, the father of three mixes a broad knowledge of the kosher wine market with such tips as how to buy wine glasses or navigate the wine list in kosher restaurants. And he takes the mystery out of the language used to describe a wine's flavour by reminding readers that while certain smells are common to certain wines (apples and vanilla to Chardonnay, plums and cherries to Cabernet Sauvignon), "there is no 'right' or 'wrong' here and everyone tastes and smells different things in a wine."

Red, white and rosé dominate the conversation, but what would a Jewish newsletter be without occasional tidbits about family? One can almost hear a chorus of mazel tovs at the mention of a recent trip Horwitz and his wife took to London and Paris to celebrate their 10th wedding anniversary.

As for French wine, "it took me a while to calibrate my palate to [it]," he said during a telephone interview.

Horwitz is a huge fan of Israeli wines. A native of Boston whose family made aliyah when he was eight, he recalls growing up in a household where virtually no alcohol other than wine for Kiddush was consumed.

But a bottle of Bordeaux brought by a guest to the family home in Israel changed that for Yossie. Intrigued by its dryness, he began, as a young adult, to dabble in kosher wine tastings, sharpening his preferences and training his nose to pick up on a good bouquet.

On returning to the United States with his wife and children six years ago, Horwitz found people tapping him for advice on kosher wine, particularly around the high-volume buying season at Pesach.

That led to his jotting down suggestions and e-mailing them to an initial contact list of 50 – the list has since swelled to about 850 subscribers, including a few hundred in Israel, as word of the free newsletter spread.

Its content also expanded: one finds not just wine recommendations (at differentprice points), but also brief, entertaining lessons on wine history and the role it plays in Jewish life. And readers can learn not just about new bottles from Israel but about the winery in the mountains of northern Jerusalem that produces them.

The newsletter's recommendations start life in a big notebook, where Horwitz pens his thoughts on what he's sampled at kosher wine tastings, the bottles in a small wine fridge at home or the more diverse collection (skewed heavily to white over red) kept in a relative's cellar.

"I am not a critic," Horwitz says. "I only write about the wines I like."

And for those who've always wondered what wine marries well with cholent, Horwitz suggests "a chunky red."

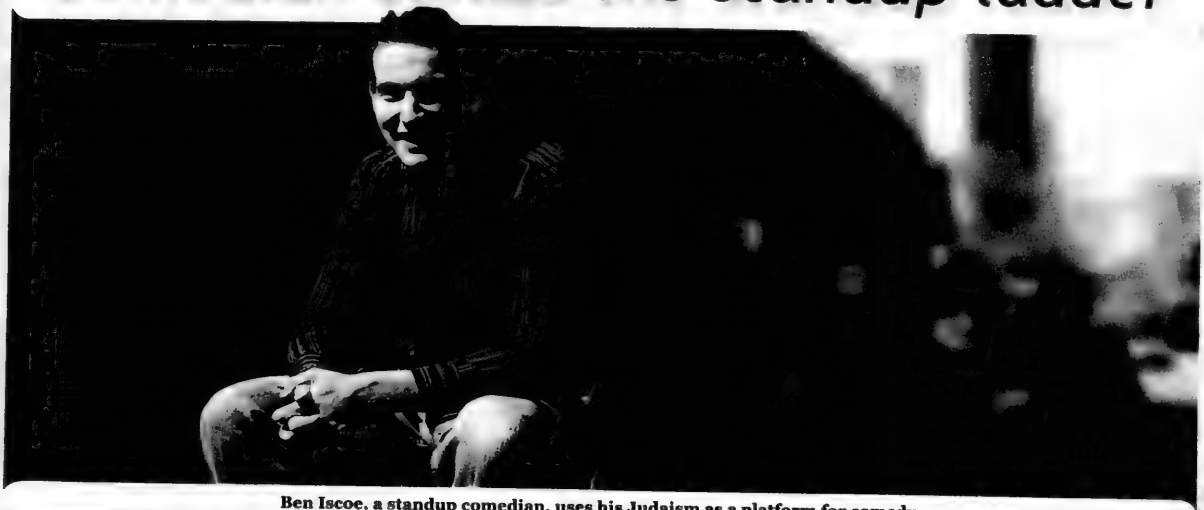
Comedian climbs the standup ladder



Ben Iscoe, a standup comedian, uses his Judaism as a platform for comedy.

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Ben Iscoe wasn't supposed to be a comedian.

"I applied to six universities [after high school]," said Iscoe, a newcomer to Toronto's comedy scene. "Five for business, one for the arts."

When Iscoe sent in his application to Ryerson University's radio and television arts program, he was just doing it to keep his options open. But then he got in. And he couldn't say no.

"It was just passion over security," Iscoe, 28, said.

At Ryerson, Iscoe focused on writing, specifically comedies.

"I liked [Ryerson]. It was an environment where you got out of it what you wanted to," he said.

"I just love telling stories. I grew up watching TV, I loved it. I think TV is a wondrous medium. People plan their lives around you telling a story."

After graduating in 2005, Iscoe started freelance writing and worked as an assistant director at the Nightingale Company, an independent production company in Toronto.

But he wasn't getting enough work as a freelancer, and assistant director wasn't quite where he wanted to be, so, in January 2009, Iscoe decided to try standup.

"I view it as a way to get my comedy to an audience," Iscoe said. "It's something I've wanted to do since high school."

With the help of a friend, he got a set at Yuk Yuk's Tuesday launch pad, specifically for new comedians.

"Most new comics start there because, quite frankly, it's the only place they know," he said.

"Very quickly I realized how large and intimate the comedy community was."

While his first set went well, Iscoe will never forget his third set. Mostly because he bombed.

"The microphone was set up in the back... It was painful, and, bit by bit, I learned that bombing is inevitable," he said.

"Jokes take such a long time to get to being good. Good jokes are jokes that are there, they're polished, solid, you have them in your pocket."

Iscoe's jokes are from everyday life, which include his experience answering awkward questions at a blood bank.

"For those of us who have given blood, you will know that I'm not paraphrasing. Question 14: have you, in your past or present profession, taken care of or handled monkeys' bodily fluids," he said during a recent set. "I am dying to meet the person that checks off yes."

During his sets, Iscoe also talks about Judaism, and his desire to have greeting cards specifically for Jewish holidays, one of which could read: "On this special day, you should savour this meal. I'll pick up the tab, I got a good deal.

"I see [Judaism] as a platform for humour. There's funny things one can play off of. I think I play off myself. Judaism is an extension of myself," he said.

Iscoe's jokes usually come from random, funny thoughts rather than a lengthy process.

"There's no protocol to come up with funny... I don't think there's a rule to comedy... you make someone think about something in a different way" he said, adding that jokes do need some structure.

"I would argue that standup is like an essay. You have a premise, you introduce it, then you have observations as evidence. That's my style of comedy."

One of the most important things for a comedian, according to Iscoe, is getting stage time.

"I'm at the first step at a pretty long ladder. [Toronto comedians] are very diverse. The only thing we have in common is we want stage time," he said, explaining that good jokes evolve with practice.

"When I started off, it was difficult, now not so much. If you want stage time, you can get it... there's so many rooms in Toronto...There's rooms only comics know about... On any given week, there's two dozen open mikes. "

So far, Iscoe has co-produced a Colours of Comedy show, which features multicultural performers, with fellow comedian Alex Kofjman, and has entered competitions such as the Toronto Comedy Brawl, in which he advanced to the quarter finals, and Yuk Yuk's Great Canadian Laugh Off.

"I remember the night I performed [at the Laugh Off.] I was surrounded by full-time, professional comics. I think I held my own."

While Iscoe didn't win, he saw the competition as a good way to get noticed.

"Competitions will have a larger audience, you'll have a larger crowd," he said.

Iscoe plans to continue standup, but he's also studying to take his LSATs.

"I wanted to do something Jews haven't had a chance to shine in," he joked. "I'm just looking for stability... my eggs are not in one basket."

Still, Iscoe enjoys performing, he said, adding that he remembers the first time he got a spontaneous round of applause while telling his blood-bank joke at Yuk Yuk's.

"It was such a high," he said.

International leaders found pro-Israel group

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A group of high-profile world leaders spearheaded by former Spanish Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar has created an organization to advocate for Israel's international rights.

Called Friends of Israel Initiative, the project aims at countering international efforts to delegitimize the Jewish state and "speak up for Israel."

Aznar outlines the group's raison d'être in an opinion piece that appeared last week in the British newspaper, the Times. Under the headline, "Support Israel: if it goes down, we all go down," Aznar links Israel's future to that of the West. "Israel is our first line of defence in a turbulent region that is constantly at risk of descending into chaos; a region vital to our energy security owing to our overdependence on Middle Eastern oil; a region that forms the front line in the fight against extremism," Aznar wrote. "If Israel goes down, we all go down."

Aznar, who served as prime minister of Spain from 1996 to 2004, said the State of Israel is an open democratic society that was created by a decision of the United Nations and is "a fully fledged western nation… confronted by abnormal circumstances. Uniquely in the West, it is the only democracy whose very existence has been questioned since its inception… Now, at the behest of radical Islamists and their sympathizers, it faces a campaign of delegitimization through international law and diplomacy.

"To defend Israel's right to exist in peace, within secure borders, requires a degree of moral and strategic clarity that too often seems to have disappeared in Europe. The United States shows worrying signs of heading in the same direction," he said.

Dore Gold, Israel's former ambassador to the United Nations, said "at a time when the enemies of Israel are seeking to delegitimize its very existence in the international community, it is highly appreciated that a group of distinguished former leaders stepped forward to recognize Israel's fundamental rights."

Jose Maria Aznar

Speaking by phone from Jerusalem, Gold said, "What they are putting out is that Israel has fundamental rights as a member of the international community and that the rights of the Jewish people were recognized by the League of Nations and the United Nations.

"They do not take positions on contentious issues. They're here to defend Israel's right to exist – something that was taken for granted 40 to 50 years ago," said Gold, who addressed the group's launch in Paris on the topic of the delegitimization of Israel.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, said the Friends Initiative could be influential because of the status of its members. They are "third-party validators who have no direct stakeholders, who are not Jews, who can't benefit from electoral considerations," he said. "These are people with the benefit of great insight, given their international experience collectively, who recognize the campaign to delegitimize Israel is morally indefensible and which puts at risk the western community.

"They recognize that the crux of the problem is an attack on western values and democratic principles that serve as the foundation not just for Israel but for western democracies… that the delegitimization of Israel is in effect a delegitimization of the West," Fogel said.

Expanding on that theme, Aznar wrote in his Times article that "the real threats to regional stability… are to be found in the rise of radical Islamism, which sees Israel's destruction as the fulfillment of its religious destiny and, simultaneously in the case of Iran, as an expression of its ambitions for regional hegemony. Both phenomena are threats that affect not only Israel but also the wider West and the world at large.

"What binds us, however, is our unyielding support for Israel's right to exist and to defend itself. For western countries to side with those who question Israel's legitimacy, for them to play games in international bodies with Israel's vital security issues, for them to appease those who oppose western values rather than robustly to stand in defence of those values, is not only a grave moral mistake, but a strategic error of the first magnitude," Aznar stated.

"Israel is a fundamental part of the West. The West is what it is thanks to its Judeo-Christian roots. If the Jewish element of those roots is upturned and Israel is lost, then we are lost, too. Whether we like it or not, our fate is inextricably intertwined."

Joining Aznar in the Friends Initiative are David Trimble, a Northern Ireland political leader who won a Nobel Peace Prize for efforts to bring the conflict there to an end; John Bolton, former U.S. representative to the United Nations; Alejandro Toledo, former president of Peru; Marcello Pera, former president of the Italian senate; Catholic author George Weigel and Fiamma Nirenstein, journalist and current member of the Italian parliament.

Layton considers Israel trip

More importantly, Layton told Fogel that as long as he could "remain faithful" to his medical regimen while in Israel – Layton was diagnosed with prostate cancer in February – chances are good the trip will happen.

Jack Layton

"We're pretty optimistic we will be able to help facilitate for [Layton] and his party a trip that will give them a more fulsome appreciation of the challenges facing Israel and the complexity of the issues that draw everybody's attention there," Fogel said. "My sense is we'll find a window in the current calendar year for him to go and benefit from that direct [Israel] experience."

With Parliament now shut down for the summer months, freeing up parliamentarians' time, Fogel guessed the trip could happen sooner rather than later.

In an e-mail response to queries about the trip proposal, Karl Bélanger, the NDP's senior press secretary, wrote that Layton "appreciates" the invitation, but the NDP won't comment on the subject until an actual trip is planned.

He added: "Many New Democrats have been to the Middle East over the years, some of them at the initiative of the Canada-Israel Committee."

WZO urges settlement freeze

The World Zionist Congress passed a resolution endorsing a two-state solution and a West Bank settlement freeze. The vote in Jerusalem came a day after some opponents of the resolution walked out of a meeting of the 36th Congress' settlement committee. After the walkout, the remainder of the meeting was chaired by Hadar Susskind, vice-president of policy and strategy at J Street, which favours U.S. pressure on Israel toward a two-state solution. The resolution endorses a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, calls on the Israeli government to extend its freeze on Jewish settlement building in the West Bank and calls on Israel to stabilize ties with the United States. After the resolution was passed by the full congress, its opponents protested by mounting the stage and singing Hatikvah, Israel's national anthem. The World Zionist Congress elects the officers and ostensibly sets policy for the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Israel eases Gaza blockade

Israel's security cabinet agreed to ease the blockade on the Gaza Strip. After two days of meetings, the security cabinet decided June 17 to "liberalize the system of allowing civilian goods to enter Gaza," as well as "expand the inflow of materials for civilian projects that are under international supervision" and "continue existing security procedures to prevent the inflow of weapons and war materiel," according to a statement from the Prime Minister's Office. The statement said the security cabinet will decide in the coming days on how to implement the decision. It didn't specify what new goods will be allowed into Gaza or what international supervision will be maintained. Tony Blair, the envoy for the diplomatic Quartet overseeing the Middle East peace process, said earlier this week during a meeting of the European Parliament in Strasbourg that Israel would change from issuing a list of items that are permitted into Gaza to a list of what is prohibited. Earlier this month Israel began allowing snack food, soft drinks and other select items into the strip, which is controlled by the terrorist group Hamas. "Israel expects the international community to work toward the immediate release of Gilad Schalit," the statement concluded. Schalit is an Israeli soldier who was captured four years ago in a cross-border raid and has been held since by Hamas without visits from the International Red Cross.

Haredim riot in Jaffa

Hundreds of haredim rioted in Jaffa, attacking police officers with bricks and rocks, over an archeological dig. Five officers were injured and 15 haredim were arrested in the riots June 16 over the dig, which the demonstrators say is disturbing a nearby Jewish burial site. A luxury housing complex is set to go up on the site once the dig is completed. Demonstrators called police "Nazis" and "murderers." The protests have been going on for several weeks. Earlier in the week, protesters damaged an archeological excavation of ancient buildings, the Israel Antiquities Authority said.

Soldier charged

An Israeli soldier is facing charges in the shooting deaths of a Palestinian mother and daughter during the Gaza war. During a hearing scheduled for next week, the chief army prosecutor will determine the exact charges in the killings. The soldier allegedly broke the army's rules of engagement when he fired on the women, aged 64 and 35, south of Gaza City on Jan. 4, 2009. The women reportedly were among a group of civilians waving white flags. The soldier reportedly joined other troops after an order was given to fire warning shots at the legs of the group. It's unclear if the soldier heard or understood the orders, as he had arrived late. If charged, he would be the third soldier to be tried for actions taken during the Gaza war in the winter of 2008-09. These would be the most serious charges.

Elton John performs

Pop star Elton John played a concert in Israel June 17, following the politically motivated cancellations of shows by other artists. About 50,000 fans attended the concert at Ramat Gan Stadium. It was his third career appearance in Israel. John's concert comes after cancellations by well-known artists such as British rocker Elvis Costello, Carlos Santana and Gil Scott-Heron, reportedly after pressure by pro-Palestinian groups. Following the May 31 interception by Israel of a Gaza-bound flotilla that left nine passengers dead, other artists cancelled, including the Pixies, Klaxons, Gorillaz and, last week, Dvendra Barnhart. "I have always believed that music inhabits a world set apart from politics, religious differences or prejudice of any kind," John said on his website, defending his decision.

Israelis key to Central African nations' development

By LARRY LUXNER
JTA

MALABO, Equatorial Guinea — On a barren, 60-acre tract of land overlooking the Gulf of Guinea, bulldozer operators turn the earth while sweaty construction workers take a lunch break in the shadow of an improvised Zim shipping container.

Inside an air-conditioned trailer nearby, Tel Aviv native Zvi Blum sits at his desk under a colourful poster showing how Malabo's evolving Centro Medico La Paz will look about a year from now.

"This is going to be the best hospital in Africa. They've never seen anything like it before," Blum says with obvious pride.

The campus he describes will boast a 155-bed hospital, doctors' residences, a 50-room hotel for guests, a pharmacy, a heliport, landscaping and a beautiful entrance fountain. Total investment: $100 million.

"We're importing all the materials from Israel, from concrete to ceramics," says Blum, whose last job was helping build the new passenger terminal at Israel's Ben-Gurion International Airport. Now he is the project director of International Medical Services GE S.A. The government of Equatorial Guinea, he says, "is paying for everything."

It's one of several Israeli-led projects in this tiny nation – population 800,000 and roughly the size of Maryland – that is awash in petroleum dollars. The Equatorial Guinean government – ruled by a president who seized power in a 1979 coup and has been denounced by critics as a dictator who manipulates elections and stifles dissent – already has financed the construction of an Israeli-run hospital in Bata, the main city in the continental part of the country, which employs more than 100 Israeli doctors and nurses.

An unknown number of Israeli advisers also provides military training to Equatoguinean soldiers guarding their Spanish-speaking nation's remote borders with French-speaking Cameroon and Gabon.

This is not the only country in Central Africa in which Israel's involvement is growing. Aside from Israeli investments, there's a political element, too, helped along in some cases by American Jews.

At a lavish 50th anniversary state dinner held May 19 in the Cameroonian capital of Yaounde, dozens of foreign dignitaries joined Prime Minister Philemon Yang in paying tribute to one of Africa's long-ruling heads of state, Cameroon President Paul Biya. (Although Cameroon formally has a multiparty system, Biya maintains a firm grip on power. He has changed the constitution to enable himself to continue running for president, and critics have charged that Cameroon's elections have been neither free nor fair.)

Among those in attendance at the dinner was Jack Rosen, head of the American Jewish Congress and president of the American Council for World Jewry. In between shmoozing with Yang and visiting Gabon President Ali Bongo, the visiting New Yorker told JTA why he was in Cameroon – a poor, tropical country of 20 million without any native Jews.

"Africa is important to us for a number of reasons," Rosen said. "Currently, three members of the UN Security Council are from Africa: Gabon, Uganda and Nigeria. At the UN, their votes are critical in such things as sanctions against Iran."

On June 9, all three countries voted to support the sanctions; behind-the-scenes lobbying by Jewish groups preceded the vote.

Israel's involvement in Central Africa also can help combat Iran's growing influence here, Rosen said, noting the increasing influence of Iran-backed Hezbollah in Cote d'Ivoire.

"It's important for the American Jewish community to play a role in African affairs and try to get them to support our causes," Rosen said. "Not only that, the Israelis have done substantial trade with Africa over the years. They can provide these countries with resources and technology in areas that are important to them, like agriculture and military training."

Miki Arbel, Israel's ambassador to Cameroon, said that in the 1960s and early 1970s, his country had excellent relations with all of sub-Saharan Africa. But that was before the Yom Kippur War of 1973, when virtually all African states severed ties with Israel due to Arab pressure.

Cameroon was among the first African states to resume diplomatic relations with Israel, in 1984. Other countries followed – Burkina Faso, Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon and the Central African Republic. Chad and Niger do not have diplomatic relations with Israel.

Last year, while serving as Israel's ambassador to Mauritania, Arbel was expelled from the country after the Arab League, meeting in Qatar, decided to freeze all relationships with Israel following the Gaza war.

In Cameroon, Arbel said, Israel is helping primarily with irrigation methods and water management. Israeli experts teach courses on irrigation throughout the country, with a focus on the arid northwest province.

Cameroon's superstar soccer player Samuel Eto'o writes a note to place between the stones of the Western Wall, in Jerusalem. Eto'o visited Israel four years ago as a guest of the Peres Center for Peace.
[Flash90 photo]

"They don't know how to cultivate and what to cultivate," Arbel said of the Cameroonians. "But if we teach them and share with them the knowledge we have acquired in Israel over the past 60 years, then they can generate more crops from their piece of land."

Israel's bilateral trade with Cameroon comes to just under $15 million, consisting mostly of imports of semi-processed wood and exports of heavy machinery and irrigation equipment. Some Israeli firms have invested in the booming telecom sector in Cameroon, while others have contracted out their expertise in security and weapons training.

As for Cameroon's position on Israel, Arbel said, "The Cameroonians understand one thing – that the conflict in the Middle East is not only an Israeli problem."

He continued, "The African Union is controlled by big countries – South Africa, Nigeria and Libya – and these are not necessarily the best friends of Israel. But politics is politics, and the politics of Cameroon is not to be against Israel."

Haredi parents ordered to jail, thousands protest

JTA

JERUSALEM — A haredi activist said Sunday that he would retract his petition to the High Court of Justice in which he claimed Ashkenazi parents in the West Bank town of Immanuel were practising ethnic discrimination by refusing to send their daughters to a school that also had Sephardi students.

Rabbi Yoav Lalum had originally petitioned the court to end discriminatory practices at the Beit Yaakov girls school, but he signed an agreement Sunday to allow the case to be arbitrated by a rabbinical court, which would ostensibly turn the issue back into an internal haredi dispute.

Rabbi Lalum advised a private Jerusalem rabbinical court that he is committed to accepting its arbitration ruling in his dispute over the school, which pits him against a group of Slonim Chassidim, the dominant sect among the parents opposing reintegration of the school.

He also said he is committed to withdrawing the petition to the High Court on condition that the chassidic group reunify the separate educational tracks at the school for the upcoming school year as the High Court had required after receiving a petition from a group of Sephardi parents who wanted to end the school's discrimination against their daughters.

At the school, the Slonim Chassidim kept their daughters separate from the Sephardi girls, going so far as to have separate entrances and a dividing wall through the school's courtyard.

The Ashkenazi parents have insisted that they are not racist, but want to keep the classrooms segregated – as they have been for years – on the grounds that the Sephardi families are not religious enough.

The High Court ruled last Tuesday that 43 sets of parents who defied the integration efforts by instead keeping their daughters home from school were to face two-week jail sentences. The parents were required to either return their daughters to school and refrain from discrimination, or face jail time.

Thirty-five men, fathers of the Ashkenazi girls in the segregated school, reported to the Maasiyahu prison in Ramle Thursday evening to serve their two-week sentence, in accordance with the ruling.

The High Court on Sunday postponed by two days its ruling on 24 haredi mothers from Immanuel who failed to report for their two-week term last week on charges of violating the court order. The prosecution told the court it would not object to revoking the mothers' prison sentences.

Haredi demonstrators thronged the streets of Jerusalem earlier Thursday to protest the Supreme Court order to integrate the Ashkenazi and Sephardi girls in the school. Thousands more rallied in Bnei Brak, near Tel Aviv, where the population is mostly haredi.

The rally in Jerusalem was also meant to escort to jail the 43 sets of haredi Ashkenazi parents from Immanuel beginning their two-week sentence for not informing the court in writing by Wednesday that they would abide by the desegregation order. The parents entered jail late Thursday afternoon.

Haredi authorities had ordered yeshivot closed on Thursday in order for the students to participate.

The protesters held signs reading "We choose Torah," "High Court against the people" and "God will rule for all eternity," as well as "Flotilla terrorists free! Students' parents to jail."

More than 10,000 police and Border Guard officers were deployed throughout the country to prevent violence, according to reports.

The parents' entrance to the jail was delayed throughout the day Thursday, as groups and individuals attempted to mediate between the parents and the court. The jail sentences were ordered after parents failed to desegregate the school.

The case has gone through months of court hearings, rulings and mediation, culminating in the court's ultimatum last week.

Parents asked to serve their sentences on different weeks so that one parent could take care of the children at home.

The court allowed this and also exempted the mothers of children with special needs and overturned the term of one mother who signed an agreement to comply with the court's ruling.

An idol among seniors

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mike Danton, a 75-year-old singer and musician, beat out 12 other contestants, ranging in age from 65 to 91, to become the winner of the fourth annual Chartwell Senior Housing's Senior Star competition with his rendition of Fly Me to the Moon.

A native of Mumbai, India, Danton plays seven instruments and has been performing in senior residences since he retired as a mechanical engineer.

He now has a chance to be one of 10 competitors invited to compete in the Senior Star national final – regional competitions were held the same day across the country – to be held in October.

Placing second was Gene Manchester, 65, a stroke survivor originally from Omaha, Neb., who sang Elvis Presley's Can't Help Falling in Love, while third place went to Al Fitleberg, who sang a medley from Fiddler on the Roof.

Fitleberg, who is "73 going on 36" moved to Toronto from Montreal five years ago to be near his family.

"I've been singing since I was five years old, and I play the saxophone and drums. My music keeps me young. Sometimes I wake up with a back ache or a headache, but when I sit down with my music, nothing hurts."

Sholom Wargon, a Canadian Jewish News advertising representative, and a judge at the competition said that "the performers are a true inspiration. As a society, we've become consumed by the notion of turning back the clock. But in trying to do so, we are, in effect, clock-watching our lives.

"These people are way too busy making music to watch a clock. So should we be."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish artist designs a cross for the Pope

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Judd Shemesh has been working hard for the past three years to perfect a glass cross to present to Pope Benedict.

"It is, no question, my best work ever," he said, proudly holding the artwork.

Although he is a Jewish man and most often makes glass mezuzot, chanukiyot, candelabras and candleholders, this is the second cross that he made for a pope.

It all started when he met Miami's Archbishop John Favarola at an art show in Florida, who asked him to create a cross. He did, and the archbishop was so pleased with his work, he asked Shemesh to design another to be presented to Pope John Paul II during his visit to Bethlehem for the millennium celebration in 2000.

Favarola introduced Shemesh to the late Rev. Robert Clune, auxiliary bishop emeritus of Toronto, who helped him to organize the presentation.

Former Thornhill MPP Tina Molinari called Shemesh a "gifted artist" as she congratulated and recognized him formally to the Legislative Assembly of Ontario in 2000.

Then, a few years ago, Rev. Clune asked him to make a similar cross for Pope Benedict, who was elected pope in 2005. The result is a colourful standing cross that depicts the crucifixion. Shemesh doesn't know yet when he's going to present the cross to the Pope.

Although he received some criticism from the Jewish community, Shemesh said he felt it was appropriate for him to design a cross from the standpoint of an artist.

"I thought that I'm an artist, and I do a lot of donations for Jewish causes," he said, so he could not refuse the project on the basis of religion.

The reason his piece is unique, he added, is because he went into the project with the intention of creating a work of art, rather than a religious symbol.

He described the second cross as being much improved from the first one.

"Like everything else in life, whatever you do, the second time is easier," he said. "I was less nervous, and things worked for me better."

The cross is made up of six pieces, each one bevelled separately and glued together using ultraviolet glue, he said, adding that this glue dries completely clear.

"I took the principle that dentists use and I thought, 'Why can't I use the same?' So I tried it, and it works," he said, adding that he hasn't seen any other people use this technique.

The image of Jesus on the cross shows him while he is still alive and suffering, depicted through facial expression.

The body is carved in the glass and painted with liquid gold, which Shemesh said means that the design will remain identical to the day he made it for at least 2,000 years. The rest of the colours are a special type of acrylic paint that does not require baking to dry.

He described the process as reverse drawing, meaning he carves the design through the back of the glass. Then, when it is finished, the image shows a three-dimensional illusion.

He said he has always been good at drawing in the reverse, able to visualize how it will look like after he is finished.

However, he did not draw the original image. Instead, he collaborated with another artist, and they carved their work into the glass.

He said he works with glass because it's the only material that time cannot touch.

"You can leave a piece of glass outside and 100 years from now, it's going to look the same," he said.

Although he used to sell his Judaic art in stores, it is now solely available for purchase directly from him.

His studio is located at his home in Thornhill, and he can be reached at 905-764-7337.

Old-time klezmer a passion for Emily Lam

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Emily Lam is 24, Asian-Canadian and from Peterborough, Ont. People are taken aback when she greets them in Yiddish.

But they are downright gobsmacked when they find out she devotes her life to the research of klezmer music, and not the kind that has moved into the mainstream, but the authentic variety that was brought to Canada by eastern European Jewish immigrants in the early 20th century.

In fact, this soft-spoken young woman may be the leading authority on klezmer music in Montreal between 1924 and1970, simply because no other academic attention has been given to the subject.

The normally demure Lam becomes excited when she talks about this little-examined piece of Canadian Jewish history.

Lam was among the presenters at the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies annual conference held in Montreal from May 30 to June 1, where she discussed her 30-page paper, People Didn't Call It Klezmer: Klezmer Music in Jewish Montreal, 1924-1970, during the public session held at the Jewish Public Library (JPL).

It's the fruit of three years' work, the last two of which has been as an independent researcher.

The library was a fitting venue because it is at the JPL archives that Lam began her field research and where her scholarly interest, lit at the University of Ottawa, was kindled by legendary JPL archivist Eiran Harris, who possesses an unrivalled knowledge of Montreal Judaica, particularly its more obscure aspects.

Lam is the daughter of Vietnamese "boat people" who settled in Canada in the late 1970s. Her first language is Cantonese. She had no connection to anything Jewish, other than friends, and had never even heard of the Yiddish language, let alone culture.

Her interest, Lam insists, was not because she could relate her family's immigrant experience to that of eastern European Jews to Canada. "I don't know exactly how to answer [why she is so interested] – for a while I was over-intellectualizing it, but really it is just something I enjoyed so much," she said in an interview.

Lam was nearing completion of an undergraduate degree in political science and history at the University of Ottawa when she spotted a course on Canadian Yiddish history being given by Rebecca Margolis. On a whim, she signed up for it.

"I had taken so many classes on European and Latin American history that I thought this would be something new," Lam said.

New, it certainly was, but she soon caught the enthusiasm of Margolis – a young Yiddishist whom Lam calls her mentor – for the vibrant immigrant Jewish world that took root in Montreal.

For her final project, Lam, with the guidance of Margolis, zeroed in on klezmer music, partly because she had been an arts and culture reporter for the student newspaper and radio, and partly because nobody else appeared to have looked into its history in Canada.

EVOCATIVE PAINTINGS RECALL JEWISH LIFE IN POLAND

One painting shows an open suitcase with the town neatly spread inside, conveying a sense that the artist carries the vision of Wierzbnik wherever he goes and that his memories of the place are so vivid and full that they cannot be contained.

The artist, Maciej Frankiewicz, was born in 1968 in Starachowice, Poland, the city previously known to its once-sizable Jewish population as Wierzbnik. Frankiewicz, who is not Jewish, has devoted much of his adult life to preserving the memory of the town's Jewish community, a world and a people he never knew.

He has produced hundreds of paintings focusing on Jewish life in Wierzbnik, works that are "by turns surreal, provocative and romantic, inhabiting an amorphous realm somewhere between slice-of-life documentary and nostalgic fantasy."

That quote comes from the publicity announcement of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada and the Wierzbniker Society, which held a private reception this week to launch I Am From Here: The Paintings of Maciej Frankiewicz in Toronto.

Hosted by Ashkenaz Festival and the Al Green Gallery, the exhibition officially opens with a public reception on June 24, 6 to 8 p.m. Al Green Gallery, 64 Merton St. Continues until July 8. 416-440-3084, www.thealgreengallery. com

Flotilla parody removed

JTA

A parody of world reaction to the Gaza flotilla incident has been removed from YouTube.

We Con the World, sung to the tune of We Are the World, the 1980s fundraising song for African hunger and rerecorded earlier this year to help Haiti following its devastating earthquake, was removed from YouTube over a copyright claim by Warner/Chappell Music, Inc.

The parody, which had three million hits, was created by Latma, a rightist Israeli group that produces political satire in Hebrew and sometimes in English. A Washington think-tank, the Center for Security Policy, funds the group.

Israel's government press office circulated and then recalled the link with a message saying that the video was not intended to be released, and that the contents do not represent the official policy of the state or the press office.

Caroline Glick, a Latma editor, said that copyright experts told the group that the use of the song for the parody falls under the fair use doctrine, a doctrine in U.S. copyright law that allows limited use of copyrighted material, without requiring permission from the rights holders, for commentary, criticism, news reporting, research, teaching or scholarship.

Drake CD finally released

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

It's finally happened.

Drake, born Aubrey Graham, released his debut album, Thank Me Later, on June 15.

Born in Toronto, the 23-year-old hip hop artist is Jewish and attended Toronto's Forest Hill Collegiate Institute. He started off playing Jimmy Brooks on the CTV teen show Degrassi; The Next Generation and signed with Lil Wayne's production company, Young Money Entertainment, in June 2009, several months after releasing his mixed tape, So Far Gone. And fans have been waiting for an album ever since.

According to Billboard and one-day sales figures, the album, which is expected to go multi-platinum, was projected to sell almost 500,000 copies in America during its first week, even after the album was leaked on the Internet before its release date.

While Thank Me Later, a 14-track album released by Young Money Entertainment/Cash Money Records, was supposed to come out in late 2009, it was postponed until this summer.

The album's songs have been compared to Kanye West's style and reflect the struggles of fame, from fake friends to love problems.

Comedian's show a 'Jewtopia'

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Elon Gold started doing standup, he didn't want to talk about his Judaism. Now he can't stop.

Gold, a comedian and actor who currently has a role on the TV show Bones, was 16 when he first started performing.

"When I first started comedy, I was frightened to be on stage, so I hid behind all these impressions… The goal was to entertain, kill and get off stage," said Gold, who will be bringing his one-man show, Half Jewish, Half Very Jewish, to the Toronto Just For Laughs Festival this July.

"Then I started speaking as myself. Then I started opening up about being Jewish."

While Gold's one-man show – which, he says, may not be suitable for gentiles and is closed captioned for the Hebrew impaired, – premiered last year at the Montreal Just For Laughs Comedy Festival, it's been in the making for about a decade.

"I've been working on it by accident. As a comedian, I have two acts – my regular, secular act and then my Jewish act," he said.

"There's no off switch when you're a comedian. Everything you observe goes through a comedic filter. You want to have an outlet to take those observations and share them with people. I have observations… sitting at a Passover table or in shul."

The show, which Gold describes as a "Jewtopia," is basically an hour and a half of these observations. It covers everything from his zaide – "my zaide was so religious, he had two toilets, one for meat, one for dairy," he says during his act – to Jews not proselytizing.

"Judaism is the only religion that doesn't recruit new members, because we know we can't get any. What's our selling point? 'Tired of that excess flap of skin on your penis?'"

For Gold, Half Jewish, Half Very Jewish is the ultimate outlet. And the ultimate challenge.

"I'm more proud of this show than anything I've ever done, any of my failed sitcoms, any appearances I've made," he said.

"Jewish audiences are the toughest audiences, because they think they've thought of everything already."

Even so, Gold loves performing for Jewish crowds.

"I feel a connection to them I don't feel with others. There's an understanding. We're on the same page," he said.

"When [Jewish audiences] hear something they didn't think of, they get thoroughly excited. That's how you come at Jewish audiences – you have to wow them with your brilliant insight."

Even then, you're not going to get big laughs, Gold said. But you will get a silent appreciation. Which makes it worthwhile.

"When you say something funny, they sort of sit back and just think, 'He'd be good at my fundraiser.' They don't give it up really."

Since his show's run in Montreal, Gold has taken Half Jewish, Half Very Jewish on the road, where he was surprised when non-Jews showed up to laugh.

"I've been everywhere, from Dallas, Texas to Tampa, Florida… I'm always shocked when gentiles show up and love it," he said.

"I think, in a way, it's nice when a group of people can come see someone they can relate to on a very deep level. At the same time, it's nice when other people… come and see what other races and religions are talking about… Funny is funny."

While Gold continues to act, he prefers standup, which he finds both scary and satisfying.

Elon Gold will perform his one-man show Half Jewish, Half Very Jewish at the Toronto Just For Laughs Comedy Festival.

"Acting is just a hundred times easier than standup. The hardest part of acting is memorizing… whereas standup is so challenging. Every single time I go on stage… I'm nervous," he said. "An audience is waiting to eat you up alive if you start sucking. You're up there for over an hour, and it's just all you."

Half Jewish, Half Very Jewish will run from July 6 to 11 at the Berkeley Street Theatre. For more information or tickets, visit www.toronto.hahaha.come/shows.

Lam researches klezmer in Canada

Plenty has been written about the import of klezmer to the United States, and Lam boned up on such experts as Hankus Nefsky and Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett. She also took an intensive Yiddish course, and now speaks, reads and writes the language.

She soon realized that not only wasn't there a Canadian equivalent to their research, but also no documentation of klezmer music exists here: no recordings, no tunebooks, no radio archives. "These musicians had become invisible. It was as if these musicians had never existed," Lam said.

Margolis pointed her in the direction of Harris. It was sound advice. Harris not only shared his knowledge of how klezmer music was transplanted to Montreal, but also introduced her to Hyman (Blackie) Herman, whose father, Israel, was one of the early klezmer musicians in Montreal and who continued the tradition himself.

Emily Lam

The year 1924 was when Herman immigrated to Montreal from Poland, and 1970 is the year he ended his career as a professional musician.

Harris, Herman and his associate, another professional Jewish musician of the era, Bill Taylor, were the main interviewees for her paper.

The title of her paper, People Didn't Call It Klezmer, was inspired by her interviewees' assertion that the term to them at the time meant a Jewish musician from the Old World, such as Herman or his contemporary Joey Kane. No one who had not known the experience of being a Jew in Europe would presume to call themselves a klezmer. They didn't even think of klezmer as a musical-genre.

Nevertheless, the younger Herman, who led his own orchestra for 14 years, and many others did play "klezmer" music at weddings, clubs and hotels. The style was popular with Montreal Jewish audiences and to a certain extent the general public, as Herman and Taylor recall the music being broadcast on radio and played at non-Jewish events.

After graduating in 2008, Lam decided to carry on her research without any intention of continuing her formal education. She had been coming to Montreal every weekend and moved here in September of that year.

Without benefit of any funding and while making a living at freelance writing and odd jobs, she delves ever deeper into a culture she likely would never heard of. She has even started learning Hebrew.

"I have a ferocious passion for it. I feel really lucky that I found something I enjoy so much… It's something I want to pursue for the rest of my life," she said.

Lam is grateful for the support she has received from almost everyone after they have gotten over their initial surprise that she could be so interested. "I guess it helps that I'm so wide-eyed and star-struck," she said.

Today, she lives in Outremont and tries to speak Yiddish to her chassidic neighbours, especially the children. "They don't say much back. They just look at me, but that's OK, I understand it's weird or strange to them," she said.

This September, she will begin graduate school in Jewish studies. She hasn't decided whether at McGill University or Concordia University.

Her goal is to track down other old-time Canadian klezmer musicians or those who listened to them to record their oral testimonies. Her work has taken on a sense of urgency, as she knows the living witnesses are becoming fewer.

Lam also continues to search for that elusive recording or even sheet music that would reveal the sound and repertoire of klezmer music in Canada before the 1980s, bringing to life what she can only now imagine.

An early CanLit star and World War II

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Few early stars of Canadian literature have faded as completely as Hugh Garner, whose prominence stretched over three decades following World War II.

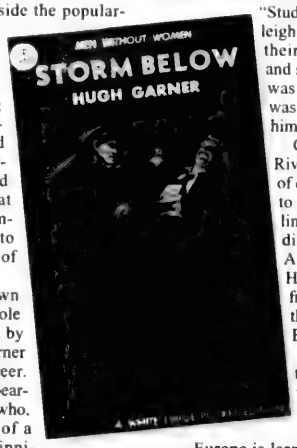
Garner is best known for his novel of the Toronto working class, Cabbagetown, which first appeared in 1950, and his staying power as a short story writer was acknowledged in 1963 when his collection Hugh Garner's Best Stories won the Governor General's Award. Garner reigned over Canadian literature in the pre-Atwood, pre-Ondaatje era, alongside Morley Callaghan, another Toronto hard-liver whose legend included a knock-out punch in the boxing ring with Ernest Hemingway.

Norman Ravvin

Garner's career began in 1949 with the publication of his first novel, Storm Below, which was based on the author's experiences in the Canadian Navy between 1941 and '43. In it, he follows the "Canadian Flower Class Corvette, H.M.C.S. Riverford" on a mission to protect a convoy of merchant ships crossing the Atlantic for Newfoundland. As the crew goes about its business, German U-boats torpedo nearby Allied ships.

Storm Below did about as well as a Canadian novel of the period could be expected to. Garner's publisher offered him a $500 advance, a third of which he spent on an Underwood "Noiseless" typewriter, which he used for much of his career. The novel sold 1,400 copies in hardcover; more than 20,000 in paperback; and was bought for serialization by the Montreal Standard, the Newark Evening News and the Chicago Sun-Times.

This success paled, however, beside the popularity of Gwethalyn Graham's wartime novel of anti-Semitism in Westmount, Earth and High Heaven, which sold a million and a half copies, including 350,000 produced for distribution among the U.S. armed forces. Graham's book, rightfully, was reviewed and read in light of its effort to treat the plight of Jews in contemporary society, as well as to present a Canadian version of this dilemma.



Storm Below has its own surprising Jewish subplot, though its role in the novel was little commented on by reviewers, nor was it revisited by Garner in his memoiristic writing in late career. The surprise in Storm Below is the appearance of naval officer Winfield Harris, who, despite his unlikely name, isthe son of a kosher delicatessen ownerfrom Winnipeg. The crew of the Riverford is a mostly Anglo, central-Canadian bunch. One Quebecer, dubbed Frenchy, comes in for his share of harsh jeers, and westerners – sometimes called Cowboy – make up their own little-seen, joked about minority.

Lt.Harris attracts special consideration, in particular from an officer named Smith-Rawleigh, who proves to be the worst of the Riverford's complement of men: "Studying the tide tables," Smith-Rawleigh says to himself, "even in the navy their Jewishness made them scheme and study to get ahead. Not that Harris was the worst type of Jew, but still it was a bit thick having to acknowledge him as a superior."

Garner depicts the captain of the Riverford – an otherwise solid figure of quiet heroism – musing in response to Harris' easy way with ship-board lingo: "There was something a little distasteful about Harris using such Anglicisms, thought the captain. Hard lines! Still, the language was free. God knows there weren't many things free to a Jew these days – in Europe, of course."

Like a lot of wartime literature and film, Garner's focus on the good guys leaves the wartime enemy largely offstage. Exactly what is happening to Jews in Europe is largely unmentioned, aside from an acknowledgment in the novel's prologue, where Garner nails down the book's beginning at "dawn of March 9th, 1943" and then lists the "many ways" one might die that day – "in the gas chambers at Osweicim, on the spittle-caking roads of North Africa, in a birth-bed in the Queen Mary Maternity Hospital in Sheffield."

At key moments in Storm Below, the reader feels that Garner hasn't figured out what it is he wants to tell his readers about Jews, whether aboard a Canadian Navy corvette or in Europe. In particular, the captain's musings, which have a sympathetic tone, reveal an underlying class consideration. The shock expressed is over the likelihood that during wartime, people who would not otherwise work together or socialize, might find themselves in intimate quarters.

In a strange and awkwardly written climactic scene, Lt. Harris responds in quiet panic to being called a dirty Jew: "I wish that I were the same as you fellows are… I'm sorry that I'm a Jew… I'm ashamed of being a Jew. Do you know what I'd like to be for a while? I'll tell you, I'd like to be a God-damn, white, gentile, Anglo-Saxon."

One wonders what Garner thought he was up to with this. It's likely that he wasn't too sure himself and his editors had no competency to help him find out. He might have been taking Graham's lead and aiming for an up-to-date examination of contemporary Canadian xenophobia. But much of what he offers is half-baked. In 1949, as a young man just out of the navy and making his way in a still unformed Canadian literary scene, Garner took a stab at difficult material and came up with something a bit embarrassing. But in Canadian writing it was a new theme, soon to become an important one, and Garner unwittingly helped prepare the way for major work in the 1950s and '60s.

Norman Ravvin's books include the novel, Lola by Night, and the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Maccabiah medalists key components of U.S. World Cup team

By EMILY COHEN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LOS ANGELES — Two Jewish soccer players from Southern California are on the U.S. team that faced England during America's first World Cup match, in Rustenburg, South Africa.

Jonathan Bornstein and Benny Feilhaber, both 25, along with Chicago's Jonathan Spector, 24, a defender for London's West Ham United and the grandson of NBA star Art Spector, comprise one of the largest Jewish contingents on a single team in the American squad's history.

Friends since high school, Bornstein and Feilhaber have been on a shared journey to the World Cup, which included stints with the UCLA Bruins and the U.S. men's national team, as well as a silver medal win during the 2005 Maccabiah Games.

Prior to the first game in South Africa, Feilhaber said the excitement was building.

"The World Cup is so close now that I start to get anxious when I think about it," he said. "It's as though there's not enough I can do to fully prepare for this event. It's the biggest event in sports in the world."

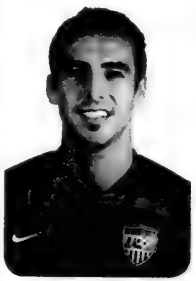
Feilhaber, who plays for Denmark's successful AGF Aahurs, traces his love for soccer back to his native Brazil. When he was six, Feilhaber's family moved to Irvine, where he became a standout midfielder in high school.

Born in Torrance, in the Los Angeles basin, Bornstein first kicked a soccer ball at age three. He played varsity soccer in high school and today is a defender for L.A.'s Major League Soccer team, Chivas USA.

Playing together is nothing new for Feilhaber and Bornstein. In 2002, the duo helped the Irvine Strikers club win its first under-17 national championship. Two years later, they were reunited at UCLA and became college roommates, which cemented their already close friendship.

Feilhaber said he and Bornstein "definitely had a special connection" because of their religion. Plus, he said, "it was easy being friends with him, because he scored all the goals, so I passed him all the balls."

For his part, Bornstein, who still rooms with Feilhaber while on the road with the U.S. men's national team, said, "When a Jewish holiday comes up, we recognize it and talk about it, but we don't celebrate too many holidays together."



Jonathan Bornstein

That's because Feilhaber spends the High Holy Days with his family. "My father is Jewish, and I have a connection with Judaism through my father and my grandparents. I know our history as a people and embrace being Jewish myself," Feilhaber said. "Of course, my proudest moment as a Jew was having my bar mitzvah in front of all my family and friends."

Feilhaber's close relationship with his paternal grandfather, who fled Austria in 1938 to avoid Nazi persecution, has strongly affected his identity as a Jew and his connection with Judaism.

"My grandfather was 14 years old when he and his family had to leave all their things behind in Austria. He boarded a ship to Brazil and left everything he ever knew," Feilhaber said. "I talk with my grandfather, who still lives in Brazil, often. His story affects my religion as well as how I see the world and my life."

Benny Feilhaber

Bornstein's relationship with Judaism also stems from his father, a Jew born into an Orthodox family in New York. While Bornstein didn't have a bar mitzvah and doesn't consider himself observant, he did grow up celebrating Rosh Hashanah and Passover with relatives. And he credits his experience representing the United States in the Maccabiah Games in 2005 with reinforcing his Jewish identity.

"It was an amazing experience. I loved it, and not just because I got to play soccer in Israel. It made me realize how fulfilling and enriched Jewish culture really is.

"I was able to explore my Jewish identity in the Old City, at Masada, at the Dead Sea. I definitely want to return some day," Bornstein said.

Jonathan Spector

Feilhaber said playing at the Maccabiah Games was an unbelievable feeling. "I competed with the best Jewish players in the world in a great environment and I was able to visit places that I had only previously heard about. Because of my family's history, the Holocaust Museum [Yad Vashem] was the most memorable moment of the trip for me," he said.

More memorable moments could well be in store for the duo in South Africa.

According to Mike Woitalla, who has covered the United States for Soccer America Magazine since its first of six straight appearances in the 1990 World Cup, "Both Feilhaber and Bornstein could make valuable contributions to the U.S. World Cup campaign. Feilhaber is a skillful, creative midfielder who is capable of dictating the rhythm of the game and making defence-splitting passes. Bornstein is an outside back who contributes to the attack with his blazing runs down the wing."

Overall, soccer experts think the United States has a good shot – at least in the first round.

"The U.S. is in a very favourable first-round group, so they should at least advance to the round of 16," said Steve Goff, the Washington Post's soccer columnist. "Beyond that, however, we can't expect the U.S. to reach the quarterfinals as they did in 2002, which was the exception rather than the rule. But another first-round failure, as happened in 2006, would be a huge disappointment and a big setback for the program."

Feilhaber and Bornstein hope to prove the skeptics wrong.

"I think we have a good chance in the World Cup if we are playing our best football at the time," Feilhaber said. "I think our team is good enough to beat anyone on any given day."

The United States tied England, 1-1, in its first game of the tournament and tied Slovenia 2-2 in the second.

Stolen wallet recovered almost 17 years later

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

Last month, Sharon Rubinstein received a call telling her that her wallet had been found at the Lipa Green Building.

She said she checked her purse and found it there, as usual. She asked the security guard if he was sure the wallet he had was hers, and he read out her name, address and emergency contact, all of which were correct.

"I thought it was a hoax," she said. "If he would have said, 'Come and meet me at the corner,' I never would have gone."

But it was at the Lipa Green Building, so she recruited a friend to go with her, and sure enough, it was her wallet they had found – one she lost almost 17 years ago.

"All of a sudden, a flood comes back to me of memories," she said, "and it hits me. Oh my God, this is my wallet."

She said she opened it up and saw a photograph of her and her brother from when they lived in Winnipeg, a picture of her kids and her old Visa card. All her other photos and identification were there, too. Only the cash was missing. After all these years, she couldn't recall how much, but it wouldn't have been a lot.

She did recall the circumstances, however.

Almost 17 years ago, Rubinstein was working as a babysitting supervisor for what was then known as the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

There was a group of people working in the office, she explained. "We went for coffee, and when we came back, our wallets had been taken from our purses."

Now, as she and her friend were returning home, old wallet in hand, they tried to figure out how it could have reached the Lipa Green Building to be found so many years later.

Sharon Rubinstein found her wallet almost 17 years after it was stolen.

The entire site of the old BJCC is being redeveloped, and all of the original buildings are in the process of being torn down.

Rubinstein's friend told her that the scene reminded her of an Italian earthquake in which people found long lost belongings, she said.

"The only thing we concluded was that whoever took my wallet probably tossed it, and 17 years later I found it," she said, laughing. "Isn't that something?"

She described feeling thrilled to have found it, particularly the photos inside, one of which was a group photo of her on a staff mission to Israel, standing in front of Masada.

She has tried calling the other people who lost their wallet in the same incident, but hasn't been able to reach anybody, she said.

She's hoping the lost long wallet will bring more good luck, she said. "I bought a lottery ticket, put it in my wallet and put it under my pillow."

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

JEWISH ORPHANS FROM UKRAINE

An estimated 137,000 Jewish children were left orphaned and homeless after the ravages of World War I and the pogroms that followed. Thanks to the efforts of Lillian Freiman of Ottawa and Ann Selick of Toronto, among others, some 150 orphans were accepted into Canada for ready adoption into Jewish families in 1921. The complicated rescue has been described as "one of the romances of Canadian Jewish life... conceived in time of grave emergency."

Thank God it's Monday, Canada

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

An Israeli taxi driver in Toronto told me, "If you want a boring life, live in Canada." I agree with him.

Toronto is a place where being polite is highly valued. I determined this recently when a police officer told me he would let me off a ticket because I had been well mannered. I'll remember that trick next time I'm stopped on the 407 doing wheelies. "Your Glock pistol is so nicely polished, sir." Manners. Politeness. Ho-hum. Boring.

If you pursue boredom, live in Canada.

Members of the Tamil community protested on a Sunday on the Gardner Expressway last year against the Sri Lankan government for killing their people. Two talking heads on local television maligned one of the Tamil leaders for blocking traffic, maintaining that the protest had been inappropriate. The Sri Lankan leader kept repeating that his group was fighting on behalf of people dying. He ended up apologizing for inconveniencing Sunday drivers. It was embarrassing, absurd, and reflected our national imperative of placing politeness above activism. Boring, leading to humiliating.

According to the law of the land, it is illegal for most non-profit organizations to practise advocacy. If Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, of which I'm president, were to criticize the government for child poverty in Canada and request meetings with officials to advocate on behalf of our country's children, the government could potentially pull our charitable status. Absurd. Control creating boredom.

The Jewish community is a reflection of our host community, and it is easy to see within our walls how boring plays out.

Diversity and debate are not respected or encouraged in the Toronto Jewish community. Rather than discuss issues, haggle over them, or even, get passionate about them, we do our best to stay low key, or criticize the individual who's stating the divergent view. We maintain niceness.

You will rarely hear public criticism of our organizations, community policies or issues. That would be impolite. Furthermore, it's hard to determine who the leaders of our community are because not too many people express opinions openly and regularly. That would mean rocking the boat, perhaps losing a donor or just being rude. "You're rude" is an important phrase in the Canadian lexicon, dished out frequently to people who challenge others on their ideas.

If individuals do express a thought about Israel, unless it's according to the "party" line – basically far right of centre in Toronto – they are labelled crackpots who "don't get something very important." Don't make waves. Boring.

Compare this with, say, Israel, where politeness will get you nowhere and the phrase "you're rude" barely has a Hebrew equivalent. I was once engaged to a Yemenite woman. I broke up the relationship because I couldn't take the shouting back and forth and what I perceived to be fighting. She didn't understand my explanation for severing our ties and hadn't noticed we were arguing. Boisterous and not so boring.

I appreciate what the taxi driver means. While my life is anything but boring, it's up to me to make it that way, as I don't having a lot of external energies to rely upon.

At a launch of the Barnes collection of art, former media mogul Conrad Black told me the (world's) joke about Canada. He said our motto is "Thank God it's Monday," meaning that the spontaneity required for the weekends scare us. Yes, I know Black is in jail and defrauded his own company, but his point is still well taken, and he is anything but boring.

World communities call attention to Gilad Schalit, now four years captive

Compiled by CJN Staff

International leaders denounced the four-year captivity of Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit last week, as an estimated 1,000 people joined the Schalit family in a protest rally in Acre to urge the Israeli government to secure his release from Hamas.

Schalit family supporters gathered in a memorial park in Acre, a few kilometres north of Haifa, as the city's Chief Rabbi Yosef Yashar addressed them. "We are calling out to the prime minister. Gilad's life is dearer to us than despicable Hamas prisoners, even if they have blood on their hands. Show leadership."

Police estimated that 10,000 marchers then participated in the first day of a 12-day procession, which began Sunday at the Schalit family home in Mitzpeh Hila in the north of the country, and is scheduled to end across from the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. When the marchers arrive in Jerusalem, Noam Schalit, Gilad's father, plans to establish a protest tent outside the home of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, where he has pledged to remain until his son is freed.

Noam Schalit

Aviva Schalit

A majority of Israelis are in favour of a swap, according to a poll published by Yediot Achronot last week. Seventy-two per cent said yes when asked if they would support "a prisoner exchange deal in which hundreds of terrorists, including murderers, are released in exchange for Gilad Schalit."

Schalit was a 19-year-old tank crewman serving with his armoured unit at the Kerem Shalom junction near the Gaza Strip on June 25, 2006, when Hamas operatives kidnapped him in a cross-border raid. He has been held since then. Despite requests from international humanitarian organizations and non-governmental organizations, including the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), Hamas has refused to allow any outside contact with Schalit. His condition is unknown, although Hamas released a video of Schalit in October 2009 when negotiations for his release were heating up.

As public pressure demanding Schalit's release mounts, Netanyahu called on the cabinet to display a "firm stance" in the face of Israeli public opinion in the belief that this will compel Hamas to moderate its demands in the prisoner swap negotiations. Israel has been negotiating with Hamas for his release through German intermediaries, but those talks have broken down.

Thousands of Israelis joined Gilad Schalit's parents, above, in a 12-day march from the Schalits' home in the Galilee to Jerusalem. They are marching to try to secure the release of Gilad after four years of imprisonment by Hamas leaders in Gaza. [Flash90 photos]

The News in Brief

Canada

Visa Revoked

TORONTO — An Indian Muslim preacher who said Jews are "our staunchest enemy" and "every Muslim should be a terrorist" had his visa to Canada revoked last week. The move came ahead of the July 2-4 Journey of Faith Islamic conference in Toronto, where Zakir Naik was to be the keynote speaker. A popular televangelist in India, he received a five-year visa while on a visit to Canada last year, the Toronto Star reported. Earlier in June, the 44-year-old physician was barred from Britain for his controversial views, which include the death penalty for gays and converts from Islam.

Rabbi Gets PhD

TORONTO — Rabbi Wayne Allen, senior rabbi of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, received a PhD in philosophy last month from York University, after 16 years of part-time study. His thesis was on 18th-century moral philosophy.

World

Ships Boycotted

STOCKHOLM — Swedish dockworkers boycotted Israeli ships. The boycott, which began June 22 and was to last one week, covered all Swedish ports. The 1,500 members of the Swedish Port Workers voted last month for the boycott in protest of Israel's May 31 interception of a Gaza-bound flotilla in which nine people died, as well as to protest Israel's Gaza blockade. Eleven Swedes were on the flotilla. On the boycott's first day, dockworkers refused to handle about a dozen cargo containers at a southwestern port. Swedish-Israeli trade comprises 0.2 per cent of Sweden's imports and exports.

War Crimes Alleged

BRUSSELS — A complaint has been filed in Belgian court against 14 Israeli leaders for war crimes and crimes against humanity in last year's Gaza war. Former prime minister Ehud Olmert, opposition leader Tzipi Livni and Defence Minister Ehud Barak were among those charged, the French daily Le Monde reported. Former Gen. Matan Vilnai and other army leaders, politicians and intelligence officials were also on the list. Much of the 70-page complaint is based on the Goldstone report. The UN report, by a commission led by former South African judge Richard Goldstone, accused Israel and Hamas of war crimes and possible crimes against humanity.

Police Go Undercover

AMSTERDAM — Police in the Netherlands may go undercover as religious Jews to identify violent anti-Semites. An unnamed police source said June 21 that Amsterdam's acting mayor is considering a suggestion first proposed by a Dutch Muslim in an interview after reports of attacks on Jews by Moroccan immigrants, Ha'aretz reported. Dutch Jewish leaders reportedly back the plan. Police already pose as elderly and gay men to catch thieves and gay bashers. There were 98 anti-Semitic incidents in the Netherlands in the first month of 2009, nearly the total of such attacks in 2008.

Wealth Giveaway

LOS ANGELES — Los Angeles philanthropists Eli and Edythe Broad have pledged to distribute 75 per cent of their total wealth, currently $5.7 billion, "during and/or after our lifetimes." In announcing the pledges last month, they joined two of America's wealthiest men, Bill Gates and Warren Buffett, in their so-called "Giving Pledge," which urges wealthy Americans to donate at least half their fortunes to charity. The couple has already given away more than $2 billion.

Meat-packing Exec Gets 27 Years In Jail

CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa — U.S. Kosher meatpacking executive Sholom Rubashkin was sentenced last week to 27 years in jail for his conviction on financial fraud charges.

Rubashkin was convicted last fall on 86 counts of fraud in connection with the Agriprocessors plant in Postville, Iowa. The jail term will be followed by five years of parole. He'll also be required to make restitution of $27 million (US) to several financial institutions.

Prosecutors had asked for a 25-year sentence, according to the Des Moines Register. Rubashkin's lawyer, Guy Cook, noting the request, called the sentence "unfair and excessive," adding that "it's essentially a life sentence for a 51-year-old man, and it's not in the public interest."

Rubashkin was acquitted last month in an Iowa state court on 67 counts of child labotr violations relating to 26 South American teens who worked at the plant.

The Agriprocessors plant was the site of a federal immigration raid in May 2008 in which 389 illegal immigrants, including 31 children, were arrested.

Pride Toronto reversal condemned

'Israeli apartheid' term to be allowed

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Pride Toronto will allow the term "Israeli apartheid" to be displayed at its July 4 Pride Parade after all.

Last week, Pride Toronto's board reversed its prior decision to ban the phrase at all Pride events and instead put the onus on the City of Toronto – which had warned Pride it could lose city funding if it didn't adhere to Toronto's anti-discrimination policies – to decide what language it considers objectionable.

In a June 23 statement explaining its 180-degree policy turn, Pride said it asked all participating groups to "read, sign and agree to abide by the City of Toronto's Declaration of a Non-Discrimination Policy, and that all groups that uphold this policy are welcome to participate" in the July 4 parade.

It said the group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA), which has marched in previous Pride Parades and was the target of the ban, had agreed to Pride's new terms and would be allowed to march.

"[Pride] places the responsibility for determining a violation of city policy back in the hands of the city, as our review process has not established that violation," Pride said, adding that it would assemble a "representative advisory panel of community leaders" to consult with the city's gay community "to recommend a set of strategic principles and a decision-making framework that will help shape future festivals."

QuAIA hailed Pride's change of heart.

On its website last week, QuAIA called the reversal "a victory for the Palestine solidarity movement, which has faced censorship and bullying tactics from the Israel lobby for far too long. The Israel lobby learned a tough lesson today about our community's proud history of standing up to censorship and human rights abuses."

But Martin Gladstone, the activist and Jewish lawyer who spearheaded the campaign to ban QuAIA, told a June 25 press conference organized by Kulanu, Toronto's Jewish gay and lesbian group, that Pride had "abdicated" to bullying and intimidation.

"The threat of anti-Israel groups to disrupt and destroy this gay pride celebration unless they can promote their anti-Israel agenda has worked. A celebration of gay rights is now a city-funded and corporate sponsored arena to spread hateful messages against Israel – a world gay rights leader," Gladstone said.

He added that Pride is "using city and public money to promote hate and intolerance in the public square. They took city grant money in compliance with the non-discrimination policies of the City of Toronto and have since rescinded its ban against hateful messaging. This creates a huge compliance issue that the city cannot ignore."

The outcry from the gay community against the Pride board's initial late-May decision to bar the term "Israeli apartheid" was loud, with some two dozen past parade grand marshals and honorees renouncing their accolades, citing censorship.

Pride was warned by the city earlier this year that it could be in contravention of Toronto's non-discrimination policy if it let QuAIA march and display its banners.

Ceta Ramkhalawansingh, manager of diversity management for the city's strategic and corporate policy/Healthy City office – which administers the city's non-discrimination policy – said Pride has met Toronto's requirements regarding the non-discrimination policy and that it's not the city's responsibility to make a determination about the term "Israeli apartheid."

She said the city has made "no determination" about the term and cannot enforce its own policy unless it's violated by city workers or by a city-run event, putting the ball back in Pride's court.

"The city has requested all funded organizations to adopt the anti-discrimination policy and to implement the anti-racism, access and equity guidelines," she told The CJN in an e-mail. "It is up to the funded organization to determine the application of these requirements to their specific structure. Any complaint that is about a non-city service or employment is addressed by the organization or by the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal."

Pride received more than $121,000 in city funding this year.

City councillor and mayoral candidate Giorgio Mammoliti, who tabled a motion in May asking that city funding be pulled from Pride if it allowed QuAIA to participate, said Pride has now "lost credibility" with the city.

"They led us on over the last month and a half, making us believe that it was all straightened away," Mammoliti said at the Kulanu press conference. "I'll be moving another notice of motion that will ask for this year's [city funding of Pride] to retroactively go back to the taxpayers and that the city discontinue future funding of the Pride parade," he said.

Fellow councillor and mayoral candidate Rob Ford echoed Mammoliti's sentiments.

"I'm disgusted by Pride's decision. There is no room for hate speech in the City of Toronto, and I'm going to do everything I can to stop this," he said, adding that he would second Mammoliti's new motion.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, called Pride's decision "outrageous" and accused parade organizers of being "weak-kneed and sad" for bowing to pressure from anti-Israel advocates.

"More than ever now, Jewish Torontonians and Canadians have to stand up and be counted. We hope they will join us at the Pride Parade as proud supporters of Israel, marching arm-in-arm with Kulanu Toronto," he told some 50 members of the media.

Justine Apple, Kulanu's executive director, said Pride events are meant to be inclusive, open, welcoming, safe and respectful.

Bernie Farber

"By rescinding the ban on QuAIA, Pride has abandoned [these principles] in favour of the promotion of hatred and discrimination. Kulanu Toronto will not sit idly by and let them spread their toxic, discriminatory and divisive ideals. We're determined to have a strong presence at Pride and will galvanize as many marchers as possible," she said.

Flanking Apple at the press conference were representatives from Canadian Jewish Congress, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, the Canada-Israel Committee and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, as well as Mammoliti, Ford and fellow mayoral candidate Rocco Rossi.

All made statements against Pride's decision, and Apple and Gladstone read statements sent by mayoral candidates George Smitherman and Sarah Thomson.

"We're all in this together," Farber said.

Although it's likely nothing will stop QuAIA from marching, Farber said that after this year's Pride event, Congress will "not shirk" its responsibilities in working with the gay community to make sure the city's non-discrimination policy is adhered to next year.

"We will be holding the city policy's feet to the fire. If not now, then in the future. We will do whatever is necessary to get the point across that this is not acceptable. [The city] now has to put some heft behind their words," he said.

Four years!

From the editor's desk...

Gilad Schalit is 23 years old. Four of his 23 years have been spent somewhere, perhaps in Gaza, perhaps not, a prisoner of Gaza's leaders, the flattered favourites of the "freedom flotillas," we must point out.

Four years ago last Friday, June 25, the young Israel Defence Forces soldier was kidnapped by Hamas. Nor should we forget that two of Schalit's colleagues were killed during the kidnapping raid by the Hamas henchman.

After four years we nearly suffocate in our sadness over Schalit's fate. We cry for his family. And we wince at the unbearable dilemma borne by the government of Israel in trying to secure his release.

But Hamas quite revels in its barbarity.

They torture Schalit's family with their taunting and teasing. They refuse any access to their prisoner by any outside individual or humanitarian agency. They have not allowed even the International Red Cross to meet with Schalit to attest to the state of his health.

Last Saturday, Hamas spokesman Ayman Taha reconfirmed that the government of Gaza will never allow the Red Cross to see their kidnapped prisoner. "We can't allow the Red Cross to visit Schalit because he is not in a prison. Therefore, revealing his location would be very dangerous," he said.

Ha'aretz reported that a member of the Hamas politburo, Osama Hamdan, complained that Israel was more focused on trying to locate Schalit than in simply exchanging the more than 1,000 prisoners that Hamas was demanding.

Imagine that!

To bring attention to Schalit's plight, a number of demonstrations calling for his release were held last week in Israel, Europe and the United States.

In Nahariya, at Israel's furthermost northern town along the Mediterranean, some 600 people marched for Gilad. In Jerusalem, the lights around the Old City of Jerusalem were turned off.

In Rome, where the Italian government had made Schalit an honorary citizen, the lights of the Colosseum were switched off.

The darkness of two of the pre-eminent historic locales of western civilization poignantly symbolize the darkness in which young Schalit has been kept hostage these past four year. Of course, it also symbolizes the darkness of the values that made and keep him a hostage. Alas, one can add as well that it also symbolizes the dark silence of he world's response to the behaviour of Schalit's Hamas jailers.

In New York, a group of ships called the "True Freedom Flotilla," intent on contrasting the actual imprisonment Schalit with the propaganda imprisonment of the people of Gaza, sailed by the Statue of Liberty on their way to the United Nations headquarters.

On Sunday Schalit's parents, Noam and Aviva, began a march that was expected to last more than a week, from their home in Mitzpe Hila in the upper Galilee and finishing in Jerusalem. The march is to dramatize their son's plight and to bring pressure on their government to conclude an arrangement with Hamas for the return of their son.

On the first day of their sombre trek, they were joined by some 10,000 supporters.

At the outset of their long march, Gilad's mother told reporters, "We're heading off on a long, exhausting journey today, and we'll return only with Gilad."

When they arrive in Jerusalem, the Schalit family will set up a tent outside the prime minister's residence. They have said they will remain there until an agreement is reached.

In a statement at the weekly cabinet meeting on Sunday, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu assured the Schalits that he will meet with them to update them on the government's efforts on behalf of Gilad. "Our hearts are with the Schalit family," Netanyahu said.

Since their son was kidnapped four years ago, the only contact they have had with him has been through three letters and one staged, concocted video.

Last Friday in Rome, Gilad's father tearfully pleaded with the people of Europe.

"As I stand here in... one of the most important cities in Europe and the civilized world, I call on the international community... not to forget Gilad. I'm asking that the same international community, and the European one in particular which pressured Israel to take humanitarian steps on behalf of the people of Gaza, would use all means available to them to pressure Hamas to take one small humanitarian step on behalf of Gilad."

UN Secretary General Ban Ki Moon has been unsparing in his support of the people of Gaza. In his last visit there, in March of this year, he explicitly told them, "The United Nations will stand with you and continue to support you."

We urge him to say the very same thing to Gilad Schalit.

Indeed we urge him to call for an independent, international investigation into the grotesque incivility of the Hamas leaders who kidnapped him. That the UN secretary general appears unperturbed by Hamas' remorseless, mockingly cruel behaviour is a discredit to him and a bleak augury for Gilad's release. But we will never forget Gilad. Nor will we ever let the world forget, either. – MBD

COMMUNITY BACKS GAY JEWS, COMBATS ANTI-ISRAEL HATE

Representatives of various Jewish organizations came out to support Kulanu Toronto – Toronto's main gay Jewish group – on June 25 in response to news that Pride Toronto had reversed its ban and would allow Queers Against Israeli Apartheid to march in the July 4 Pride Parade. Pictured with Kulanu executive director Justine Apple, third from left, are, from left, Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center; lawyer Martin Gladstone; David Spiro of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto; Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, and Toronto mayoral candidates Rocco Rossi and Giorgio Mammoliti. Also present, but not pictured, were Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber and president Mark Freiman, as well as mayoral candidate Rob Ford.

Vaughan takes a look at home-based shuls

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The City of Vaughan will very likely consult with community members again before proceeding with zoning bylaw amendments regarding places of worship, Ward 5 Coun. Alan Shefman told The CJN last week.

The consultations will probably take place in late fall, he added.

Shefman is planning to bring a motion to Vaughan Council to ask staff to do further consultation following a June 1 committee of the whole hearing that was open to the community, he told The CJN. People wanted to have more input, he added.

Alan Shefman

Having spoken informally with colleagues about his initiative, he said the plans were "pretty definite."

Because of Thornhill's large Jewish population, the bylaw in question – zoning bylaw 1-88 – affects a number of synagogues that are based in homes.

Shefman estimates that the population of his ward – bounded by Steeles Avenue, Yonge Street, Highway 407 and New Westminster Drive – is approximately 60 per cent Jewish. "It's a vibrant Jewish community."

He said he's aware of at least three or four home-based synagogues in Thornhill.

In the past year, Shefman estimates, he has had 25 to 30 complaints about home-based congregations. Most are related to excessive noise and inconvenience, and/or safety concerns because of the number of parked cars.

"There are lots of places where minyans are held, usually a small group of people getting together and davening in someone's house. That's not the issue," said Shefman. "The issue is when a group of people try to create a synagogue without the appropriate applications that are necessary."

Among other requirements, he said, buildings have to be inspected for structural and fire safety to comply with current bylaws.

The proposed amendments would include an increase in minimum lot frontage from 20 metres to 30 metres, and a requirement that the lot abut a street with a minimum right-of-way of 26 metres or more.

Parking changes would be implemented through a separate zoning by-law incorporating approved recommendations, according to records from the June 1 hearing.

Changes could result in legal places of worship not conforming to the new bylaw.

But Shefman was skeptical that existing home-based shuls in Thornhill even meet the current requirements. "The ones that come to my mind have never fulfilled the requirements," he said. However, he added, at least one is working with the city on changing that.

"What we really want is compliance with the bylaws," Shefman said.

The bylaws exist for a reason, he said. "There are serious safety issues. At least a couple of times streets have been parked up on both sides. Fire vehicles would have difficulty manoeuvring into the street."

The city can impose fines or turn to legal remedies in court, but generally it doesn't have the power to shut down places of worship that don't meet standards, Shefman said. In one case, he said, numerous fines have been imposed over the past 15 years, and city staff have made repairs.

In the last three or four years, Shefman said, the city has initiated a number of investigations concerning people who have moved into homes and done major renovations without informing the city, "claiming they were going to have a few study sessions there," but then running newspaper ads seeking members to join their synagogues.

"As much as we want to support synagogues in the community, we also have to be aware of the needs of people living in the community who expect to live in a residential environment, and they can't get into their driveway. Noise is happening. Bright lights are shining into their backyards."

Rabbi Avrohom Bitterman of Ateres Mordechai – a congregation located in the basement of a house on Arnold Avenue – said only one neighbour has complained to him, about someone parking too close to a stop sign.

The congregation, which was established in February 2009, offers daily services and weekday classes. Between 30 and 40 people attend Shabbat morning services, and classes can have up to 20 students, although smaller groups of less than half a dozen are more typical, Rabbi Bitterman said.

"I would like to live at peace with everybody," he said, adding that congregation founders were in touch with city officials when the shul was established.

A Thornhill resident who asked that her name not be used told The CJN that a Torah procession to a nearby home-based shtibl "disrupted the entire neighbourhood" because of the noise and number of parked cars.

"I don't want to phone the city," the woman said. "They're my neighbours. I don't want to start having a fight with them."

Anyone who wants to provide input regarding the bylaw amendments concerning places of worship should contact Arto Tikiryan at the City of Vaughan, 905-832-8581, ext. 8212, and ask to be placed on the planning department's list.

Israeli general fights for disabled children

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

When Israeli Maj.-Gen. (Res.) Doron Almog visited Toronto last month, he wasn't here to talk military strategy, he was on a mission of mercy.

He's a decorated Israel Defence Forces (IDF) soldier, a fierce defender of the Jewish state and the man who helped spearhead Operation Moses – the airlift and liberation of thousands of Ethiopian Jews in 1984 – but Almog is now fighting for Israeli children with autism and severe cognitive impairments.

In 2002, he founded Aleh, an Israeli network of residential facilities for children with severe physical and cognitive disabilities.

Since 2004, he has also been focused on building a fully equipped, self-contained community – the Aleh Negev-Nahalat Eran Rehabilitative Village on behalf of disabled children and young adults with severe cognitive disabilities – located near Ofakim in the Negev.

The organization is a labour of love for Almog, whose son, Eran, died of cancer in 2007 at age 23 after spending his whole life locked inside himself due to autism.

Since Eran's death, Aleh's Negev community has been retitled Nachalat Eran in his honour.

"It is a village unique in the world," Almog told The CJN after a speaking engagement with the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce. "We always thought our son would live longer and would be able to make use of this village for his whole life. We wanted to guarantee his future care."

Sadly, that was not to be. But the Almogs decided that stopping their work on behalf of the most vulnerable children – "those who have no voices of their own," Almog said – would dishonour the memory of their son and what he taught them about themselves.

"We're building [the Nachalat Eran village] for all the weakest members of Israeli society, for those deprived of protecting themselves," Almog said.

He said that in his years of military service, he was always privileged to be surrounded by "the best soldiers in the battlefield," but the children he helps through Aleh need him and others to be their soldiers in the battle against autism and cognitive disabilities.

"As parents, we all want and believe our children will grow up and surpass us. But when the opposite happens, it's endless pain and tragedy.

"It reshapes your life," he said, adding that his son and people like him rely on their caregivers "every minute of the day" and are the "purest people on earth" because they've never done any harm.

Eran never uttered a single word in his 23 years, but Almog said he learned tremendous amounts from his son's constant, "shouting silence."

"He would question me just by being there. 'Father, how can you protect me? You can protect Israel, but do you have enough power to build a future for me? My dear father, this is all about your values. Put your ego aside and build a better life for the weak like me,'" Almog said, his voice breaking.

"If I stop working for Eran after his death, what does that say about me? So we've now taken the responsibility on ourselves" to finish what was started with Aleh, he said.

Almog said his organization also exists to break the stigma and stereotypes that plague children with autism, adding that people from all walks of life volunteer with Aleh in any way they can.

"We get volunteer soldiers, prisoners, Mossad agents, students... We have Bedouin and Muslim workers," he said.

Aleh prioritizes its services for Israeli children, but there is also room to accommodate Jewish children from the Diaspora, he said.

At present, Nachalat Eran can accommodate 114 residents and treats more than 3,000 children on an outpatient basis. However, Almog said that over the next few years, the plan is to raise capacity to allow for 250 residents and 12,000 outpatients.

So far, Canadian organizations such as UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and various philanthropists have contributed generously to help Aleh, but there's always a need for more donations, he said.

Almog said he plans to approach the Jewish communities in Montreal and Calgary on his next visit to Canada.

"We want to build an endowment fund to ensure the future of Aleh."

His main advice to parents who have recently received news their child has a sever cognitive disability is to not let shame, anger and their own egos get in the way of loving the child.

"Make them the centre of your life. Don't turn your back on your child. Support them and try to change world consciousness" about their condition.

Guide dogs change lives in Israel

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Guy Simchi went blind, he lost more than his sight. He lost his place in society.

"I'm a very social person. I love people. I like to talk to people, to know people. I started to walk by myself [with a cane]... The feeling was that I'm alone. Nobody's talking to me, nobody's coming close to me. It was very unpleasant."

More than his ability to socialize, Simchi, who went blind from diabetes when he was 32, lost his ability to run, to identify his son's friends and to easily move around his house.

"When I got blind, it was hard to understand... if you can do anything. I decided I wanted to continue life, because I love life," he said. "But it was not very easy to continue. I had to know my house again. It was hard for me to understand where I am. I had to learn everything again."

Simchi, now 39, is a social worker in Ganei Tikva, Israel. He has two sons, aged five and two, and is currently pursuing his PhD in social work.

The Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind has graduated more than 350 dogs in Israel.

He was also a speaker at the Canadian Friends of Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind's first annual Evening of Miracles, a reception that highlighted the importance of supporting the training of guide dogs in Israel.

For Simchi, it was a guide dog, a calm, cheerful black Labrador that changed his life.

"When I met Turner, I held his harness. I started walking. I felt that I could fly," Simchi told a crowd of more than 300 at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue in Toronto.

Simchi, who used to run and play tennis before he became blind, hadn't played any sports for two years.

"With Turner, I could run," he said before his speech. "I started to cry... It was amazing."

Turner also helped Simchi step back into society. Suddenly, people in the street weren't avoiding his cane – they were petting his dog.

This is all thanks to the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind.

The centre was founded in 1991 by Norman L. Leventhal, its president, and Noach Braun, a former paratrooper in the Israel Defence Forces who used to train dogs for military purposes.

When Braun found out that Israel had no guide dog program, he approached Leventhal, a prominent member of New York's Jewish community, and together they founded the centre, which is funded mostly through donations and has so far graduated more than 350 dogs.

Leventhal is pleased with their accomplishment. "We're helping Israelis to regain their lives. It's hard to imagine how difficult it is when they're blind," he said before the speeches at the recent event. "A guide dog is a bridge to the sighted world."

Guide dogs are bred specifically for their intelligence, even temperament, physical strength, stamina, loyalty, trainability and non-excitability. Labrador and golden retrievers are preferred, and some are brought to Israel from Canada.

Puppies are given to foster families until they're one year old. They're exposed to busy Israeli streets and traffic and taught to meet new people and sit quietly for long periods of time.

They're then tested by the centre to see if they are suitable to become guide dogs, and trained for five months. Only about 60 per cent of possible guide dogs graduate the program. Then they are paired with a blind Israeli and take a four-week training course.

The total cost of a guide dog, from birth to its retirement at 10 years of age, is around $25,000, although all of the centre's services, from training to veterinary work, are free. The Canadian Friends event, held on June 21, raised about $80,000, enough for more than three dogs.

CIC launches post-flotilla online campaign

Asks Canadians to walk in Israelis' shoes

What would Canada do if a terrorist entity subjected Canadian citizens to ongoing attacks?

That's the hypothetical question being asked by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) in a newly launched Internet information campaign and 30-second video advertisement called "What Would We Do?"

Moshe Ronen

CTV Newsnet was scheduled to start broadcasting the ad this week.

The campaign's website – launched June 22 in response to continued negative world opinion of Israel's military action against the Gaza flotilla on May 31 – contains a mix of video and print information designed to encourage Canadians to reconsider why Israel conducts its arms blockade of Gaza.

The site has had more than 1,000 visits since its launch. But the CIC said it expects that number to skyrocket once the ad begins showing on Newsnet.

For now, the campaign's primary focus is on reminding people that Hamas is a terrorist organization bent on the destruction of Israel and with ties to a larger jihadist agenda aimed at defeating the West.

In a statement last week, CIC chair Moshe Ronen said it's important for Canadians to understand why the arms blockade of Gaza exists.

"[It] is entirely to prevent Hamas from smuggling weapons to use against Israeli civilians. We cannot forget that the arms blockade is a legitimate, defensive action that both Israel and Egypt have undertaken in direct response to tens of thousands of missiles fired on Israeli homes, schools and communities over several years," he said.

The whatwouldwedo.ca website contains links to the CIC's Facebook page by the same name, as well as various drop-tabs with information about the history of Hamas' rise to power, its attacks against Israeli citizens and a host of articles dedicated to exposing the Gaza flotilla as one that "had nothing to do with human rights" of Palestinians.

CEO Shimon Fogel told The CJN that this new CIC campaign was designed in the hope it would "go viral" online.

Shimon Fogel

The website will also be updated regularly until the CIC is satisfied that Canadians "have a full appreciation for who and what entities like Hamas and Hezbollah are, and what it is they represent in terms of not just being a threat to Israel and regional stability, but as part of that [terrorist] network anchored in Tehran that seeks to foment violence, unrest and a jihadist agenda," he said.

Globe editorial takes hard line on Hamas

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Given the extent and the intensity of the international condemnation of Israel following Israel's botched May 31 seizure of the Mavi Marmara, it was almost inevitable that a sober re-adjustment would take place.

The Globe and Mail lead editorial of June 22 provided a model of the latter (even though the paper had previously maintained a moderately critical position about Israel's mistakes).

The June 22 editorial made the paper's position clear in the opening paragraph: "Having welcomed Israel's pledge to immediately ease the blockade of goods into Hamas-ruled Gaza, the Quartet of Mideast peacemakers on Monday warned that the current situation in Gaza is 'unsustainable and unacceptable and not in the interests of anyone concerned.' It is a fine sentiment, but there remains an immutable obstacle to any lasting relief to the Gaza predicament. It is not Israel. It is Hamas."

While the Globe welcomed changes that Israel made to the long list of goods that will be allowed into Gaza for the benefit of the civilians there, the paper was firm about the need for Israel to maintain an embargo on any materiel that Hamas could use for warfare, including "dual-use construction supplies."

The paper was also firm about the nature of Hamas, and how Israel should react to it. It commented that "Israel cannot afford to relax its guard against a group that is dedicated to the purpose of wiping it off the map. It cannot deal with the Hamas government, negotiating sensible accommodations with give-and-take."

This might be read as a response to analysts both in the West and in Israel who've been arguing recently that, for pragmatic reasons, Israel should reach out and talk to Hamas. These analysts, however, while raising expectations of what Israel should do, fail to make any demands of Hamas even though the Quartet (the United Nations, European Union, Russia and the United States) years ago set out conditions for Hamas to meet if it is to be considered a responsible negotiating partner: renounce violence, accept existing Israeli-Palestinian peace agreements, and accept Israel's right to exist.

Hamas refuses to comply. Although some of its leaders have appeared occasionally, if inconsistently, to favour the notion of a long-term truce with Israel, even along a supposed "two-state" idea, Hamas' conditions for such an arrangement – including the "right of return" of Palestinians – still entail the elimination of Israel as the Jewish state.

It is no wonder then that the Globe was unequivocal in its depiction of Gaza's rulers: "Hamas has established a terrorist statelet, which harbours a range of extreme Islamist factions, and is a client of theocratic Iran." It was equally unequivocal when it stated that as long as Hamas remains Hamas – that is, refuses to conform to international demands mentioned above – it will remain "the immutable obstacle" to peaceful co-existence between Israelis and Gazans.

While the Globe has not been shy about criticizing certain Israeli policies from time to time, its position on Hamas has been consistent.

What was a greater surprise was the New York Time's editorial on the Middle East, which also appeared June 22. The Times has not been as consistently firm as the Globe about Gaza's Islamic rulers. Even in this latest editorial, the Times refers to Hamas as a "militant" group.

Still, the paper called on Israel to focus international attention and pressure on Hamas, "which continues to rocket Israeli cities and refuses to accept Israel's right to exist." The Times wrote that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "has rightly refused to abandon the sea blockade of Gaza" as long as this prevents Hamas from acquiring weapons and rockets. (The paper commended modifications to Israel's blockade policy that directly affects Gaza's civilians.)

What remains to be explored in media circles is what Egypt's responsibilities should be, given its own border with Gaza. Contrary to common wisdom that views, as hidden, the 500-800 "smuggling" tunnels running between Gaza and Egypt at the border town of Rafah, the traffic of goods is quite out in the open. But Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak keeps insisting that the onus for the delivery of humanitarian aid remain solely Israel's responsibility. Egypt's effort to maintain the fiction that Israel is the "occupying" power of Gaza is worthy of critical examination.

G8 message hits mark

The leaders of the Group of Eight developed countries – Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Russia and the United States – met in Huntsville, Ont., last Friday primarily to discuss global economic concerns. Before the eight leaders travelled to Toronto on Saturday to continue their discussions with a dozen other world leaders, comprising the Group of 20, they issued a final statement of 43 paragraphs and two annexes that touched upon a wide swath of pressing issues including non-economic ones. Among the issues were 16 related to "international peace and security." One of the 16 issues dealt with the Israel-Palestinian conflict. The leaders' delivered an omnibus recitation of endorsements covering many contentious aspects of the conflict, most pro forma. But there were some notable references in the statement:

• "We welcome the decision of the Israeli government to set up an independent public commission to investigate these events [the May 31 flotilla incident], which includes international participation, in the expectation that it will bring to light all the facts surrounding this tragic incident in line with the statement of the president of the UN Security Council of June 1." This should put an end to the call by Israel's enemies for a different investigation.

• "We will continue to support the strengthening of Palestinian Authority institutions." The reference explicitly excludes Hamas.

• "We call for the immediate release of the abducted Israeli soldier, Gilad Schalit." It was the last reference in the very long paragraph of references, but even so, it was significant, given its timing, namely, on the fourth anniversary of Schalit's kidnapping.

The final G8 statement bears no legal weight. Nevertheless, we commend the group for not merely jumping on the currently speeding anti-Israel bandwagon, for hitting the mark on some key issues and for actually remembering the plight of Gilad Schalit.

More soldiers fall

How tormentingly ironic and profoundly sad that as security forces were trying to restrain and in some cases fight back against the nihilistically violent Black Bloc thugs in Toronto last Saturday, two Canadian soldiers were killed trying to restrain and fight back against the violent, jihadist Taliban in Afghanistan.

Master Cpl. Kristal Giesebrecht, 34, of Wallaceburg, Ont., and Pte. Andrew Miller, 21, of Sudbury, both medics, were killed by improvised explosive devices some 20 kilometres southwest of Kandahar City. Their deaths bring to 150 the number of Canadian troops who have died in the fight against the Taliban. May God comfort the families and friends of last weekend's fallen soldiers, along with all the mourners for all of the troops who have fallen in Afghanistan defending the people there and the values of democracy which it is our belief they seek our help in embracing.

No discrimination against Sephardim

The editorial "The hurt that wounds deepest" accuses the haredim in the town of Immanuel of abhorrent discrimination against Sephardim (June 24). Shulamit Amichai, the head of the Ministry of Education in 2007, sent attorney Mordechai Bass to investigate the alleged charges. He concluded that the division was not ethnic, but based on different religious standards, such as modesty of dress and Internet and TV use. Even Ashkenazi girls who didn't follow the criteria were not accepted. He wrote that any child whose parents were willing to accept the school's conditions was accepted. Furthermore, 27 per cent of the girls who attend the chassidic tract of the Beis Yaakov school are Sephardi! How then can the school be accused of discrimination? Two weeks ago, in Ashdod, a woman was accused of murdering her neighbour. She was remanded to house arrest because she is a mother. How then can the Supreme Court send the Immanuel mothers to prison when they, too, have children who need them?

The word Sepharad means "Spain" in Hebrew. Spain was the centre of the Inquisition. Ashkenaz means "Germany", the country that was responsible for the murder of six million Jews during the Holocaust. Is it a sign of honour that we call ourselves after two of the most anti-Semitic countries in history? We will only resolve this problem when we, both Ashkenazim and Sephardim, see ourselves as Jews, period.

State must intervene against racism

I appreciate Rabbi Yehiel Ben Ayon's stand against the ethnic prejudice behind segregation of Ashkenazi and Sephardi girls at the Immanuel school ("Prejudice can't stand," June 24). However, his argument that "in no democracy would a court mandate, under the threat of physical and monetary pain, which school its citizens should send their children to" is contradicted by the history of one democracy – the United States.

Brown vs. Board of Education, the 1954 U.S. Supreme Court decision ending racial segregation in American public schools, required strong government activism in some states to guarantee the right of black children to attend hitherto segregated schools. In 1957, Orval Faubus, the governor of Arkansas, called out the National Guard to deny black students the right to enter Little Rock High School. President Dwight D. Eisenhower brought in the 101st Airborne Division to open the school to black students. President John F. Kennedy had to take similarly strong action in 1963, calling out the Alabama National Guard to integrate the University of Alabama. In Israel, the threat of the two-week incarceration of parents may not be politically astute, but on occasion a state must intervene forcefully against entrenched racism.

New Israel fund's grants

Groups that have received substantial sums from the the New Israel Fund (NIF) have attacked the legitimacy of Israel as the Jewish homeland, called for the return of all Arab "refugees" and their descendants, justified the designation of Israel as an apartheid state, attacked Israel in submissions to the UN's Goldstone commission, promoted calls for boycotts, divestments and sanctions of Israel and supported the prosecution of Israeli officials in Spain. By calling the NIF to account, the NGOs that carried out these actions have been named and the sums they receive from the NIF have been published.

In a letter to the editor from NIF Canada, not one of these serious accusations is denied ("New Israel Fund's record distorted, June 10). Instead, we are told of some good works done by the NIF. Then, to obscure the participation of those NGOs supported by the NIF in the worldwide propaganda campaign vilifying Israel and the Jewish people, we are told that the only standard for rejection by the NIF is engaging in or espousing violence. I hope the NIF will apologize for its attacks on its critics, since it has admitted that it's not ashamed of funding these NGOs that attack the very nature of Israel as the Jewish homeland and, if they themselves do not espouse violence, willingly work with others who do.

'Israeli apartheid' is a misnomer

It is ironic that Queers Against Israeli Apartheid are protesting in Toronto's Pride Parade against the only country in the Middle East where gays openly serve in the military and are free from threats and intimidation. While no one questions that Israeli Arabs deserve improvements in government services, anyone who has lived in, or visited, Israel and seen Israeli Arabs and Jews sharing workplaces, universities, hospitals, beaches and more, realizes that "Israeli apartheid" is a misnomer.

Secular-haredi tensions boil over with school case

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

The showdown between Israel's Supreme Court and the parents of students at a haredi school found guilty of discriminatory practices against Sephardi girls has brought already strained secular-religious relations in Israel to a fever pitch.

A remark by Supreme Court Justice Edmond Levy that the court's decisions are not subject to rabbinical approval went straight to the heart of the matter, with irate haredi demonstrators declaring that if they had to choose between the court and their rabbis, the rabbis would always come first.

The fundamental argument over whether the courts or the rabbis have the ultimate authority reflects a longstanding clash between Theodor Herzl's vision of a secular democratic state for the Jews and haredi notions of a Jewish state subject to rabbinical law.

For secular Israelis, impugning the authority of the courts means anarchy. For the haredim, overriding rabbinical rulings means perverting God's will. At issue is a test of the capacity of the Zionist, secular state to impose its will on a large group of haredim who are often derisive of its democratic, secular institutions.

The latest angry confrontation between the state and the haredim began with a ruling by the Israeli Supreme Court in April ordering a school run by Ashkenazi Slonim Chassidim in the West Bank town of Immanuel to stop excluding Sephardi girls from their regular classes.

In the state's view, the practice constituted a form of intolerable segregation and violated basic principles of equality and human dignity. The offending Beit Yaakov school agreed to more mixed classes.

But rather than comply, the Ashkenazi parents started their own school next door. They argued that the segregation wasn't ethnic but religious. The Sephardi girls, they said, came from homes less strictly observant than their Ashkenazi daughters – for example, homes with TVs and Internet connections – and they didn't want their daughters influenced by those who were less religious. They said Sephardi girls were welcome at the Ashkenazi-dominated school if they met the standards for stricter religious observance.

Tens of thousands of haredim took to the streets two weeks ago in Jerusalem and Bnei Brak to protest the Supreme Court's Immanuel ruling. In the photo above, the sign reads "We have chosen the Torah." In the photo lower left, the sign reads "We shall walk in the ways of the Torah, through fire and water, and we will sanctify the name of Heaven." [Israel Sun photos]

The court ordered the parents to send their children back to Beit Yaakov or face fines. The parents ignored the court order and didn't pay the fines. The court found them guilty of contempt and ordered that they be sent to jail for an initial two-week period to reconsider their position.

Amid defiant singing and dancing, 35 of the 38 fathers went to jail last week. The mothers failed to report for their prison terms on the grounds that they needed to be home to look after their younger children.

There are conflicting accounts over what caused the brouhaha and what it means.

The Slonim Chassidim say that in a true democracy, they should have the right to educate their children in any way they please. They say the Israeli state, like the Romans and Greeks before them, is interfering in matters of religious principle. Just as their ancestors, they say, they'd rather face punishment than compromise their religious beliefs. In the chassidic account, the parents' going to jail was presented as a form of martyrdom, showing up the inhumanity, lack of values and wanton persecution of the haredi Orthodox by the secular Israeli state.

Secular Israelis see things quite differently. Many regard the Immanuel school case as a reflection of a much wider phenomenon, that of the haredim milking the state for funds without accepting its authority or performing the ultimate duty of Israeli citizenship: army service.

Haredi schools are largely state-funded but don't teach the country's core curriculum. The secular press in Israel has been inundated with articles blasting the haredim for defying the state's authority while tapping into its budgets for health, education and welfare. Nowhere else in the world would haredi Jews have the temerity to behave this way, the secularists say – nowhere else would they defy state law or mock the Supreme Court.

Many see the standoff as a test of strength that the liberal democratic state can't afford to lose.

"Don't give in to Immanuel," the liberal daily Ha'aretz exhorted in an editorial.

"We must not surrender," echoed journalist Yair Lapid, who reportedly is on the brink of launching an anti-clerical successor party to Shinui, the party once led by his late father, Yosef "Tommy" Lapid.

The Orthodox-Sephardi Shas Party was more ambivalent. Shas was created in the mid-1980s to combat Ashkenazi discrimination against Sephardim, so it may have been expected to take up the cause of the Sephardi students and families. But to do so would have seemed like siding with the Supreme Court, which is anathema for Shas. Its spiritual leader, Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef, resolved the dilemma by coming out against discrimination, but more strongly against taking the case to the Supreme Court.

"Anyone who appeals to the secular courts will have no share in the world to come," Rabbi Yosef declared.

Other recent rulings by the Supreme Court have compounded the strains between the haredim and the state, as well as a string of violent clashes between haredi demonstrators and police. In mid-June, the Supreme Court ruled against state stipends for married yeshiva students on the grounds that similar stipends for married university students were abolished in 2000. A seven-member panel ruled that this constituted a violation of the principle of equality in the distribution of public funds. Either all married students should get the stipend or none, the court ruled.

Shas leader Eli Yishai has vowed to introduce legislation to overrule the Supreme Court decision.

The ruling was seen as a major blow to the haredim, many of whom choose to study Torah rather than work for a living. This exempts them from mandatory army service.

The haredim also clashed recently with police during demonstrations against building on sites where ancient bones are believed to be buried. These often violent protests were led by a small radical group in the haredi camp known as the Atra Kadisha. In May, there were clashes over the removal of bones – believed to be pagan – from the site of a new rocket-proof emergency room at Barzilai Hospital in Ashkelon. In June, there were protests in Jaffa over bones at the construction-site of a boutique hotel.

For its part, the Israel Defence Forces is considering launching a new plan that would allow more yeshiva students to enlist, and more yet to join the labour force. Yeshiva students currently must remain in school until middle age in order to stay out of the army.

Meanwhile, with the basis of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government a strategic alliance between Likud and Shas, government ministers have had very little to say on the Immanuel school brouhaha for fear of upsetting their haredi coalition partners. But it also means that Shas is unlikely to do anything that could topple the government.

If tensions remain high, it could strengthen secular parties in the Knesset willing to take a stand against the haredim. That's what happened in 2003, when Shinui won 15 seats. But three years later it lost the seats when members defected to other parties.

Whether the current haredi-secular tensions will translate into a political shift, and whether that could be sustained, remains to be seen.

Thoughts from a peace activist

I'm also a peace activist.

I pray for peace every day. Three times a day, I recite the prayer Sim Shalom, asking God for world peace. I dream of peace, just like Isaiah dreamt that mankind "will beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks." And I hope for peace, much like former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin hoped for peace, when he said to PLO leader Yasser Arafat: "We say to you today in a loud and a clear voice: enough of blood and tears. Enough."

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Like Isaiah and Rabin, I'm also a peace activist. And as a peace activist, I have some questions for the "peace activists" who travelled on the "Free Gaza" flotilla. Why is it that when you search for peace, you ignore the plight of the Uighurs in China and the Fur, Zaghawa, and Masalit tribes in Darfur? Why do you remain silent about the pro-democracy movement in Iran?

And yet you worry so much about injustices in the Middle East. So why is it that you couldn't bring one little package to kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, who has gone four years in captivity without a visit from the Red Cross? And why is it that as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad builds a nuclear bomb to destroy Israel, you say nothing?

My dear "peace activists," to understand the situation in Gaza, you must read Hamas' charter and then compare it with Israel's Declaration of Independence.

The Hamas charter says that "Israel will exist and will continue to exist until Islam will obliterate it." It quotes The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, and quotes a Muslim tradition that says: "The stones and trees will say O Muslims, O Abdulla, there is a Jew behind me, come and kill him."

On the other hand, Israel's Declaration of Independence offers peace to the surrounding nations. It says: "We extend our hand to all neighbouring states and their peoples in an offer of peace and good neighbourliness, and appeal to them to establish bonds of co-operation and mutual help with the sovereign Jewish people settled in its own land."

This comparison clearly demonstrates who loves peace and who loves bloodshed.

Yes, I want the Palestinians to live in peace and prosperity, but at the same time, I want Israelis to be able to live in peace in their ancient homeland.

I want Israeli children to play outside, and not worry abotit Qassams, Katuyshas and suicide bombers.

I agree that we've had "enough of blood and tears." We've also had enough of Ahmadinejad, Hamas and Hezbollah.

It's time for a true peace in the Middle East.

Teaching universalism through particularism

Loyola High School in Montreal recently enjoyed a major victory in defending freedom of religion and the dignity of religious teachings against relativistic educational bureaucrats when a Quebec Superior Court judge ruled against Quebec's Ethics and Religious Culture (ERC) course. The Catholics who fought hard – and paid huge legal fees – deserve high praise for their doggedness. But I wonder why Jews abdicated on this important issue. Why did we let our Catholic brothers and sisters bear the burden on this one?

Gil Troy in Montreal

The central complaint against the ERC course is not its worthy goals but its multicultural methodology. It tries to teach students mutual respect and openness, essential commodities in a diverse democracy, but it forces religious schools to teach religious and ethics from a neutral, non-religious perspective. The result is a superficial, trendy and relativistic "I'm OK you're OK," everything-is-equal approach to profound theological and moral questions.

Judge Gérard Dugré blasted this approach from a legal perspective in a stinging 63-page decision. In the passages quoted most often in the media, Dugré wrote: "In this age of the respect of fundamental rights, of tolerance, reasonable accommodation and multiculturalism, the attitude adopted by the [education] minister, is surprising… Canadian democratic society is based on principles recognizing the supremacy of God and the primacy of the law – both of which benefit from constitutional protection… The obligation imposed on Loyola to teach the ethics and religious culture course in a lay fashion assumes a totalitarian character essentially equivalent to Galileo's being ordered by the Inquisition to deny the Copernican universe."

Bland preaching about being nice to one another rarely works. Teaching values for values sake is far less effective than teaching values as part of a sacred conversation, consecrated by God, tradition, or history. Coincidentally, on June 17 in Jerusalem, the evening before Dugré ruled, Jonathan Sacks, Great Britain's chief rabbi, demonstrated the profundity that results when rooting calls for openness in tradition rather than basing them on the latest will o' the wisp trends breezing through society. Before an overwhelmingly religious crowd at Jerusalem's Great Synagogue, Rabbi Sacks delivered a rousing call for an Orthodoxy balancing the universal and the particular, the university and the yeshiva, and secular learning with religious wisdom.

He noted that the Torah begins with a universal story – the story of humanity – and only plunges into a more particular Jewish tale in Genesis 12 with the emergence of Abraham and the start of the Jewish people's story. That structure emphasizes the importance of universal values, of mutual acceptance, while recognizing that we can best achieve those values by acknowledging our own particular tribal allegiances and narratives, rather than denying them.

Traditions, stories, rituals, beliefs, link individuals to their communities and to enduring values. They help individuals feel a part of something bigger than themselves without being overwhelmed by simply being allied to humanity. In his magnificent 2002 book The Dignity of Difference: How to Avoid the Clash of Civilizations, Rabbi Sacks develops this insight further, arguing that "by going back to the roots of biblical monotheism we may find, to our surprise, a theological basis for respect for difference, based not on relativism but on the concept of covenant."

He explains that Judaism has a notion of "dual covenant", with humanity after the flood, and with one people at Mount Sinai. These two covenants balance our commitment to the universal, meaning our rights and responsibilities as human beings, with "respect for the particular," which gives us our special identity – and mission – to achieve universal goodness through our particular commitments.

Given the enduring Jewish conversation balancing universal and particularism, and the distress many Jewish educators in Quebec felt when the ERC was announced, our communal passivity on this issue was disappointing.

Did we try to avoid rocking the boat, hoping to preserve our government subsidies? Or, at the end of the day, did our leaders sense that for all the talk about tolerance by the very bureaucrats trying to impose a curriculum of tolerance, there was actually little tolerance for Jews to stand up and explain just how we teach tolerance?

Immanuel school furor about religiosity, not prejudice

JTA

The recent Israeli Supreme Court ruling against parents of students in the Jewish town of Immanuel and the ensuing massive haredi-Orthodox demonstrations on the parents' behalf present an opportunity to either jump to conclusions or objectively evaluate the facts.

Rabbi Avi Shafran in New York

Several Sephardi parents in the town brought a lawsuit aimed at preventing some Ashkenazi parents of students who had been studying in the local Beit Yaakov girls school from maintaining a new school the latter group had established.

The court ruled that the new school was born of illegal ethnic discrimination, and later that the "new school" parents' subsequent second choice – to send their daughters to a school in another city – also was forbidden to them.

The court fined these parents for each day they refused to comply with its order to return their children to the Immanuel Beit Yaakov, threatened them with prison and then made good on the threat.

What gives here? There are two versions.

First, the one presented by most media: racial prejudice lay at the root of the parents' desire for a separate school for their children and their refusal to abide by the court ruling. The large number of supporters who turned out on their behalf reflected a general haredi Ashkenazi disdain for Sephardim.

Version 2: the jailed parents sought only to preserve the religious standards the Immanuel school had maintained for many years. Changing demographics over the years in Immanuel brought an influx of families with less stringent standards of Jewish observance, dress and insularity than the original residents of the town. Some of the longtime residents with school-age children saw a need for two different educational institutions to service the community's girls. That most of the new families happened to be of Sephardi heritage played no role at all in that decision.

The first version was endorsed by Israel's Supreme Court, which pronounced that the new school was the result of prejudice, and ordered the parents who had founded it to return their children to Beit Yaakov.

These parents, however, insisted that the court finding was wrong and that their choice was a matter of religious conscience. They refused to be coerced into sending their children to a school of the court's choice and readily went to jail fighting for that right. The larger haredi community, wary of the Supreme Court and seeing it as having ignored clear facts in this case, rallied to the parents' side.

There is no doubt that discrimination against Sephardim exists in Israeli society, and that it is pernicious and must be fought wherever it appears. The question at issue in Immanuel, though, is whether such discrimination or parental concerns for the tenor of their children's education motivated the establishment of the new school.

Several simple facts, although oddly absent from most news reports, seem to point in one direction. More than a quarter of the girls who had been enrolled in the new school were Sephardim. Indeed, one of the parents who went to jail for refusing to obey the Supreme Court order was of Yemenite background.

And there were Ashkenazi girls who remained in the original Beit Yaakov, too. What's more, not one applicant to the new school was rejected. Any girl willing to abide by the school's religious standards was welcomed, regardless of her ethnic background. The "segregation," it seems, consisted of nothing more than two schools offering two different sets of religious standards.

Yet the headlines blared on, using charged phrases like "ethnic prejudice" and "segregation," and portraying the jailed parents and their supporters as seeking to discriminate against Sephardim, invoking, as did the court, the struggle by American blacks for civil rights in the 1950s and '60s.

They got it backward. The haredi parents and marchers were championing their rights as parents to educate their children as they wish. They, if anyone, are the Martin Luther Kings here. The court, sad to say, assumed the role of American segregationist Bull Connor.

Israel's special relationship with Turkey unravels

Israel's special relationship with Turkey – the first Muslim country to recognize and establish diplomatic relations with Israel – has fallen apart since a violent incident in international waters on May 31 during which Israeli naval commandos stormed a Turkish ship attempting to breach Israel's blockade of the Gaza Strip and killed nine pro-Palestinian Turkish activists in the process.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel's decision to uphold the siege by preventing the Mavi Marmara and five smaller ships in a flotilla from delivering humanitarian supplies directly to Gaza – which has been controlled by its arch enemy Hamas for the past three years – had immediate and severe repercussions. After denouncing the raid as "a bloody massacre" and "inhumane state terrorism," Turkey's fiery Islamist prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, recalled Turkey's ambassador in Tel Aviv, Ahmet Oguz Celikkol, who was due to leave his post in August.

Not content with this measure, Erdogan delivered a condescending lecture in which he accused Israel of breaking the biblical commandment against killing. Then, in a conversation with U.S. President Barack Obama, Erdogan called the raid "a historic mistake" and warned Israel that it risked losing its "best friend" in the Middle East.

Within days of the deaths of the Turkish activists, who embarked on their politically inspired voyage with the connivance of the Turkish government, Turkey applied further pressure on Israel in an orchestrated campaign.

The Turkish president, Abdullah Gul, raged that Israel would never be forgiven. Turkey's ambassador in Washington and its former envoy in Israel, Namik Tan, hinted that Turkey might break off relations altogether unless Israel apologized, lifted the blockade and, in line with a United Nations recommendation, accepted an international investigation. Upping the ante, Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu said that "the future of ties with Israel will depend on [Israel's] attitude."

In yet more unmistakable signs that Israel's honeymoon with Turkey has ended, Erdogan declared that Turkey has no intention of exporting natural gas to Israel via a newly built pipeline, Turkey's minister of energy and natural resources announced that no new projects will be launched until relations are "normalized," and a major Turkish newspaper reported that defence contracts with Israel worth billions of dollars have been frozen.

Since Israel has already rejected the idea of an international commission and resolutely refuses to lift the siege – which had grown increasingly tighter since the abduction of the Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit in 2006 and Hamas' armed takeover of Gaza in 2007 – Israel's tarnished relations with Turkey are bound to spiral downward even further.

In fact, Israel's troubled ties with Turkey have been in decline since the winter of 2009, when Israel invaded Gaza in an attempt to stop Palestinians from launching cross-border rocket barrages aimed at its civilian population. Erdogan, who was conspicuously the first foreign leader to receive a Hamas delegation after its successful insurrection in Gaza, branded the invasion as "state terrorism." He used the same harsh words to denounce Israel's bombardment of Lebanon during the 2006 war.

Recep Tayyip Erdogan

The war in Gaza particularly incensed Erdogan. At the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, held shortly after the Gaza ceasefire, he branded Israel's president, Shimon Peres, as a thug. "When it comes to killing, you know well how to kill," he asserted before stomping off a stage he shared with Peres.

Since then, Erdogan has described Israel as the main threat to peace in the Middle East, accused Israel of creating "an open-air prison" in Gaza and, in a brazen feat of historical revisionism, has claimed that the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron and Rachel's Tomb in Bethlehem "were not and never will be Jewish sites, but Islamic sites."

Israel has reacted to Erdogan's attacks with restraint and anger. Several Israeli cabinet ministers, notably Defence Minister Ehud Barak, have visited Turkey to mollify the Turks. But last January, Israel's deputy foreign minister, Danny Ayalon, humiliated Turkey's ambassador in Tel Aviv in a tense encounter. More recently, Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman infuriated Erdogan by saying that Turkey has lost its role as an impartial mediator in future talks between Israel and Syria.

Erdogan's anti-Israel blasts are calculated, judging by an interview he gave to a Spanish newspaper in which he suggested that his verbal assault on Peres in Davos was deliberate. "That opened a new approach to foreign relations," he admitted. "We have a philosophy of strength. It is a foreign policy with a backbone."

Turkey, the pre-eminent power in the Middle East during its Ottoman empire phase, has adopted an assertive position in the region since Erdogan's accession as prime minister in 2003 as head of the Justice and Development party. Erdogan's staunchly secular predecessors, inspired by the example of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk after the formation of the Turkish republic in 1923, distanced Turkey from the Middle East and curried favour with the west as Turkey modernized itself.

Ahmet Davutoglu

Turkey vastly upgraded its somewhat distant relations with Israel during the mid-1990s, signing a series of political, military and economic agreements that alarmed Arab neighbours and Iran. This occurred at a time when Turkey was quarrelling with Syria, Iran and Iraq, when Israel and the Palestinians were engaged in peace talks, and when Turkey– the sole Muslim member of NATO – incorrectly assumed that its eventual membership in the European Union was a foregone conclusion.

With Erdogan's rise to power, the equation changed as Turkey incrementally began emphasizing its Islamic heritage, mending fences with Syria, Iran and Iraq and championing the Palestinian cause. Erdogan's turn to the east, lubricated by his desire to impress conservative voters, contain Kurdish nationalism and penetrate potentially lucrative markets in Arab countries, is best exemplified by Turkey's rapprochement with Syria and Iran.

Earlier this year, Turkey and Syria removed visa requirements for travel and conducted joint military exercises. In 1999, however, Turkey massed troops on the Syrian border after accusing Damascus of supporting the banned separatist Kurdistan Workers' party.

For years, Turkey regarded the Islamic regime in Iran with more than a little suspicion. But of late, Turkey has formed something of an alliance with Iran. Last year, while on an official visit to Iran, Erdogan accused western powers of treating Iran unfairly and called its president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, a "friend."

Much to the annoyance of the United States and its allies, Turkey, which opposes economic sanctions to pressure Iran to halt its militarized nuclear program, co-brokered a plan under which Iran would exchange low-enriched uranium for fuel rods for a medical research reactor. More recently, Turkey opposed a fourth round of United Nations sanctions against Iran while archly claiming that the world has turned a hypocritical blind eye to Israel's nuclear program.

Turkey's reconfigured Middle East policy has been an open source of concern to Israel since Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's observation six months ago that Turkey is drifting toward Iran and Syria.

Since then, the Israeli foreign ministry has issued a paper asserting that Turkey is trying to improve relations with the Muslim world at Israel's expense, while Israel's chief of military intelligence, Gen. Amos Yadlin, has claimed that Turkey is dabbling with a more radical version of Islam. Last month, Israel's ambassador in the United States, Michael Oren, said that Turkey has "embraced the leaders of Iran and Hamas" and is turning away from the West.

It is clear that Israel's strategically important relationship with Turkey has come to a crashing halt. Turkey, once Israel's ally, has become an adversary. By any measure, it is a menacing development in the Middle East.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

The significance of holiness

By RABBI MIRIAM MARGLES

"The degree of our being human stands in direct proportion to the degree in which we care for others." –Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel

I want to share with you a vocabulary lesson I learned from Professor Moshe Halbertal of Hebrew University. It is a teaching with profound implications for social, political, economic and environmental justice. The teaching is about the difference between kodesh, the holy, and chol, the ordinary.

Rabbinic Reflections

Though he is by no means the first to state it, Halbertal asserts that Jewish practice, the work of a Jewish life, is concerned with holiness. The Torah addresses us saying, "Kedoshim tihiyu – Be holy, because I, your God, am holy" (Leviticus 19:3). We are commanded to remember Shabbat and make it kadosh. In Judaism, every act of enjoyment and consumption has a blessing, bringing kedushah, holiness, into an ordinary act, be it eating, smelling sweet flowers, or wearing new clothes.

Holiness, something that God represents by God's very nature, is something we participate in, something we become by bringing God's presence into the moment. The Jewish mission is not simply to be good or moral, but to embody holiness in all aspects of our life.

Tragically, the language of holiness is often perverted by those who use it as a brand of ownership, as if to say: If I call it holy, then it is mine. This stance wields holiness like a sword. But, Halbertal argues, kedushah calls for action that entails the very opposite of this kind of absolutism and self-righteousness. The heart of the Jewish idea of holiness is the renunciation of sovereignty – not grabbing and owning, but letting go.

When we relate to Shabbat as holy, taking a day every week to give our efforts a rest, to shift our attention from making an impact on our environment to letting it impress itself upon us, we engage in the practice of regularly forfeiting our own sovereignty, displacing human will with the awareness of the Creator as Sovereign.

When we make eating a holy act, we pause before eating for a moment of gratitude in order to recognize the Source that brought this food into being, to know food as a gift.

Jewish tradition applies the term kadosh to ritual and ethical acts equally. The range of Jewish practice teaches us to exercise the muscles of kedushah, preparing us to be kedushah warriors, so that we learn to keenly see the differences between chol and kodesh. These practices train us to awaken and respond when the creations that should be treated as kodesh – when life and dignity in all its mysterious forms – have become degraded, instrumentalized, treated as chol. Further, mitzvot train our physical and spiritual muscles to take action so as to transform that which has been commodified back into its sacred and rightful state.

As individuals and as a community, it is our call to restore God's presence to the places from which cruelty, self-interest and injustice have exiled God. This practice entails seeking to look at the world through God's eyes, eyes that perceive infinite and precious worth in existence rather than merely the functions that existence can be brought to serve. In small and large ways, we have the ability to forge paths of kedushah, embodying all its transformative power, in everything we do. The inherent sanctity of life calls for no less.

These five sisters

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Within the Torah portion of Pinchas is the narrative of five sisters, the daughters of Zelophechad. As the Torah outlines the census-taking of Israel and each family's designated inheritance within the land of Israel, these five sisters present a case of perceived injustice before Moses.

Midrashic Moments

Because there are five sisters and no brothers, their family isn't listed among those who will inherit a portion of land within Israel. The case they present to Moses discusses their father, his righteous life, his death and the absence of an inheriting son. It doesn't seem right nor just to these women that their father would lose his allotted portion simply because he left daughters and not sons to inherit it.

The argument that is brought before Moses is then brought by Moses before God, who affirms the daughters' claim. In fact, the Torah states that not only will the daughters inherit, but the law of Israel will change from that moment onward.

A Torah moment such as this one is pivotal for our understanding of process. Why was this argument heard? An unhappy family of women is representing a perceived injustice of the ancient world focusing on their treatment as women within a world where women are most definitely treated that way. In other words, they weren't arguing for being treated unfairly given their worldly context. They argued for being treated unfairly given a Torah context.

We are often addressing the same question when we study the "generation of the wilderness" in the Torah. These are the people who were slaves in Egypt, they stood at Mount Sinai and built a Golden Calf, they believed the spies, and they rebelled against Moses and God time and again. We often ask whether or not they could "get" Torah. Was Egypt so ever-present in their hearts that the concepts of Torah could not find a place?

And yet, in the midst of rebellion, slander, betrayal and confusion, five sisters approach Moses to argue the values of Torah in the world they live in. They argue for consistency between theory and practice.

Many texts in both the Talmud and midrash confirm the argument and process followed by these women. The argument the sages affirm from these sisters is not the specific case they represent but the structure they promote. According to the Talmud, when the sisters were discussing privately what was bothering them, they realized that "humanity favours the men, but God deals equally with both men and women."

Whether or not they inherit land is secondary to the model for which they argue: the Torah values we learn must be the Torah values we live.

As we study of this anomalous generation of Jews, liberated slaves who seem to never quite understand their lives, we hear five voices – five sisters, five women – who understand, argue against and change their world.

Midrash after midrash credits these sisters with righteousness, intelligence, wisdom of experience and spiritual elevation.

Five sisters: Mahlah, Noa, Hoglah, Milcah and Tirzah. Five role models.

Jewish Life

The Temple, Part III

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The destruction of the first Temple was a major calamity for the Jewish people, one that led to the Babylonian exile.

It has been estimated that approximately 15,000 of Judah's elite were carried off into captivity, including the last king, Johaiakin. Amazingly, his ration lists were found during the German excavations of Babylon more than a century ago.

Some 70 years after the destruction of the Temple, Cyrus the Great, the founder of the Persian Empire and conqueror of Babylon, issued his famous edict allowing those of his subjects who had been deported to return to their homes. For the Jews, Cyrus was a deliverer and a beneficent ruler. Despite the edict, many Jews chose to remain in Babylon and made it a major centre of Judaism for the next 1,000 years.

The most famous leaders of the returning exiles were Ezra and Nehemiah. Ezra was known as the second Moses for his work on the biblical text, while Nehemiah was the political leader who had been appointed by the Persians as the governor, or satrap, of Judea.

The return of the Jews had occurred earlier under various individuals. The first governor of Yehud – the Persian province of Judea – was Sheshbazzar, an appointee of Cyrus who apparently even paid for a good portion of the work to begin the Temple's reconstruction.

Sheshbazzar laid the foundation for the structure, but the rebuilding was done during the reign of Zerubabbel, who was an appointee of King Darius.

Despite opposition from the Samaritans, the descendants of those left behind after the Assyrians deported the legendary Ten Lost Tribes, the Persian kings were very supportive of the exiles. According to our sources, Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah, the Temple was finally completed during the reign of Artaxexes I, the grandson of Darius, and son of Xerxes. Despite the unfavourable picture we get of the Persians in our school texts, they were actually quite sympathetic toward the Jews.

This Second Temple was in use for almost 500 years until an Idumaean upstart – Herod – took over the throne of Judea from the Hasmoneans, just before the beginning of the Common Era. Herod was an astute politician. He supported Marc Antony in the war between him and Octavius but astutely switched sides when Antony and his lover, Cleopatra, committed suicide after they lost the Battle of Actium in 31 BCE.

Herod then embarked on a building program that put Solomon to shame. Among his achievements was the marvellous winter palace that we know as Masada. Its excavations in the early 1960s under the legendary archeologist Yigael Yadin have become iconic for the modern State of Israel. Herod also built a magnificent port city on the shores of the Mediterranean using the latest Greco-Roman building techniques. He named it Caesarea, after his patron, Octavius, who had become Caesar Augustus.

But Herod's grandest building project was rebuilding the Temple in Jerusalem, possibly as a way of ingratiating himself with his subjects, who, despite his largesse, detested him for his tyrannical rule. Ironically, it was the Temple's destruction at the hands of the Romans during the First Jewish Revolt that made the ruins of the Temple a touchstone of Jewish hopes and aspirations for almost 2,000 years. The Temple's remains were called the Wailing Wall, but after its miraculous recovery during the Six Day War, it became known as the Western Wall.

It was this recovery that finally gave Israeli archeologists the opportunity to study the remains of this revered edifice. However, Israeli magnanimity in giving the Muslims control of the Temple platform has hindered its study and led to the destruction of precious evidence on the top of the mound.

Jews in canoes

Jewish & Digital
By Mark Mietkiewicz

And in tents. And on trails. And in forests.

Although it may shatter some stereotypes, there are plenty of Jews who take the opportunity to say goodbye to the city – and even the cottage – and venture into the wild. There they find the ideal setting to commune with friends and nature – and to also do some davening and Jewish learning.

You don't have to convince Stephen Altbaum and his buddies about the virtues of getting out. For more than three decades, they have explored Ontario's waterways and wilderness in what The CJN described as "an excursion of faith, friendship and food."

"Wherever we are we make Kiddush and light candles on Shabbat," organizer Altbaum said. As for the camaraderie, "There's this amazing chemistry between us. Sure, we've had our small problems, someone will get on someone else's nerves. But this group has kept a lot of psychiatrists out of work." [http://bit.ly/jcamp1]

Camping with the guys sounds great but so is getting out with your own family. You can watch videos as Moshe-Yitzchak and his parents take to the great outdoors. Despite the soggy weather, their spirits seem upbeat and they even are able to glean some meaningful lessons from some unlikely events. When he is able to nurse a spark into a roaring fire, Moshe-Yitzchak says, "Just like there was just one spark in the fire… so in some Yidden, there is only one spark and if you blow on the spark and you give it lots of care, it will become a nice fire with lots of sparks." [http://bit.ly/jcamp2] And for something a bit different, check out the video of challahs roasting over an open flame.

There is more to observing Shabbat than just refraining from lighting a fire. And that has probably frightened more than one observant lover of the outdoors from camping from Friday to Sunday. Aside from kindling, there are prohibitions regarding extinguishing, building, cooking, laundering and carrying in areas outside the boundaries of an eruv. You can get an idea of what Shabbat campers need to be aware of and some possible solutions at this site. [http://bit.ly/jcamp7] The National Jewish Girl Scout Committee has recommendations about keeping kosher and enjoying Shabbat in the wild. [http://bit.ly/jcamp4]

If you have the longing to get outdoors but don't have the skills, equipment or nerve to do it by yourself, there are groups that will guide your body and nurture your soul. BurningBushAdventures.com offers New England-based hiking and canoe trips in the spring and dog sledding trips in the winter. [http://BurningBushAdventures.com] Meanwhile, AdventureRabbi.com leads groups around Boulder, Colo. TevaAdventure.org has ventured as far afield as Alaska and the European Alps. [http://TevaAdventure.org] [http://bit.ly/jcamp5]

Closer to home, Toronto's Village Shul organizes an annual three-day Canoe 'n' Learn in Ontario's Frontenac Provincial Park. "We're not offering a camping trip geared to super athletes," says organizer Richard Bassett. "We're hoping for a group of about 24 men for frum-friendly leisure and learning in the great outdoors." [http://bit.ly/jcamp6]

And to prove that there really is a community of like-minded outdoor enthusiasts, visit the Facebook group "Jews don't go camping…?" There, you'll read comments like, "As a single Jewish mom, I took my boys camping many times pitched the tent and did the rest!" and "That's nonsense… Where is it written that Jews must fall into the stereotypes that were created for us?" [http://bit.ly/jcamp8]

Perhaps it shouldn't be so surprising, this Jewish wanderlust, this urge to explore the great outdoors. After all, it's been in our blood for thousands of years. As it says in Exodus 19:2, we "entered the wilderness of Sinai and encamped in the wilderness." If our ancestors camped out for 40 years, is it really so odd if some Jews want to do it for a few days?

Program seeks Jewish mentors for Somalis

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Jewish-Somali Mentorship Project, recently launched in Ottawa, was lauded by Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney as an excellent example of Canadians helping Canadians.

"This project is so important to the government of Canada, to me personally, and it should be important to all of us," Kenney said at a June 16 information session at Congregation Machzikei Hadas for the program, in which Jewish professionals mentor Somali students and young professionals.

It's modelled on a similar program in Toronto.

The evening, organized by Jewish Family Services of Ottawa (JFS), the lead partner on the project, was designed to outline the goals of the program and to recruit Jewish mentors. Other speakers included Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Machzikei Hadas, JFS executive director Mark Zarecki and Mark Persaud of the Canadian International Peace Project, who came from Toronto.

Jason Kenney

Zarecki has been proactive in outreach to various ethnic communities and has established JFS as a leader in inter-community relations in this city. He said the mentorship program is a natural outgrowth of the existing relationship between the Jewish and Somali communities.

"There are a lot of Jews who are engaging in social activism across the country, but they don't identify as Jews when they do that work," Zarecki said. "It's important for us to be a light unto nations."

Persaud explained the origin of the program. "We came up with this project because we recognized that one of the most important needs of the Somali community is to create a cadre of Canadian-Somali leaders who will give back to their community," he said. "This is the first time in Canada that we know of in which the Jewish community and a large Muslim community are working together on a national level."

Kenney noted that the Jewish community is one of Canada's most successfully integrated ethnic groups and will have much to offer the new Somali community from its own experience.

"Many of the founders of the Jewish community in Ottawa came as refugees of pogroms. Many others followed as [Holocaust] survivors after 1945… and when we look at the remarkable success of the Canadian Jewish community today, its hugely disproportionate success, it is a community which overcame systemic discrimination," Kenney said. "It is amazing to think that the Jewish community in Canada is essentially a refugee community which has overcome many obstacles and barriers and it is a model for other communities."

Persaud was in Ottawa previously to host an information session at Carleton University for prospective Somali mentees and was surprised by the huge turnout. Twenty students were expected, but 75 arrived and expressed interest in being paired with a mentor.

Hopefully, there will be enough mentors to fill the need, he said.

"This arguably could be a watershed moment in Canadian history, because there is no sense denying that we have had problems with certain communities, and this is the first time that we are doing something that is not only the absence of something bad, but actually doing something good," Rabbi Bulka said.

It's expected that the Ottawa program will help serve as a model for more programs across Canada.

Bone marrow drives can help save lives

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Miriam Walfish has never met Zack Englander. But she wants to save his life.

Englander, 20, is a first-year pre-med Yeshiva University student in New York who was diagnosed with leukemia several months ago and needs a bone marrow transplant.

This is where Walfish comes in.

About two years ago, Walfish, a Torontonian, donated bone marrow for an 11-year-old girl. While the girl didn't survive, Walfish understands the importance of bone marrow drives.

This year, Walfish's oldest son, who's studying in Baltimore, told her about a bone marrow drive being held for a Yeshiva University student. And it immediately touched a chord.

"I said, 'OK, let's do a drive here. It was an instinctive… thing to do," she said.

This is how Toronto 4 Zack, the bone marrow drive held on June 27, was born.

"We called it Toronto 4 Zack because we thought it had a cute sound, but it really is amazing. Toronto really has shown up for this kid," she said.

Held at Shomrai Shabbos Chevra Mishnayos Synagogue, the drive drew about 250 possible donors, who were asked to swab their cheeks for about a minute. Each swab will be tested, and if a match is found, the participant will be asked to come in for a blood test.

While the Toronto 4 Zack bone marrow drive is looking for a match for Englander, each swab will be put on an international database, meaning that matches can be found worldwide.

Shari Ichelson Silverman, one of the founders of Shari's Mission, which partnered with the event's organizers, also knows the importance of bone marrow drives – mainly because one saved her life.

Ichelson Silverman, who was diagnosed with leukemia last summer, founded Shari's Mission with her parents as a way to find a bone marrow match for herself and for anyone else in need. This March, she received her transplant, and she is now in remission.

"I think it's important people see me, and see that it does work. I'm here to prove it," she said at the Toronto 4 Zack drive, adding that her own match came from overseas, possibly in England.

"I'm officially a survivor now."

For Zev Rosenblum, another organizer of the drive and a friend of Englander's father, the drive is a way of uniting the Jewish community.

Mike Ichelson, left, and daughter Shari Ichelson Silverman, the founders of Shari's Mission, worked with Toronto 4 Zack organizers to find a bone marrow match for a Yeshiva University student.

"A fundamental principal of Judaism is… all of us are responsible one for the other. It doesn't matter whether there's someone in need in our own city or another part of the world. We have a responsibility to try and help each other," he said.

This is also why Sholom Ross, 28, got swabbed.

"I'm trying to help a fellow Jew," he said. This drive "shows solidarity with other Jewish people. When someone is in trouble, we're there to help."

Rebecca Goldreich, 17, a volunteer who was also swabbed, agreed.

"[Getting swabbed] is the right thing to do. It's not painful, it's just one minute of swabbing… there's not even a blood test," she said. "It's the chance to save someone's life."

Shari's Mission will hold another bone marrow drive during CHIN Radio's annual picnic on July 1 from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m., July 3 from 11 a.m. to 10 p.m. and July 4 from 11 a.m. to 9 p.m. at the Better Living Building at the Canadian National Exhibition grounds. Group pushing anti-terror bill

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A grassroots organization formed in the wake of 9-11, aims to have legislation passed that would allow victims of terrorism to launch civil suits against state sponsors of terror in Canadian court.

The Canadian Coalition Against Terror (C-CAT) is in the process of gathering thousands of signatures on a petition that will force parliamentarians to discuss – and keep top of mind in the House of Commons – Bill S-7: An Act to deter terrorism and to amend the State Immunity Act. It is also known as the Justice for victims of terrorism act.

C-CAT defines itself as a "non-partisan advocacy body comprised of Canadian terror victims, counterterrorism professionals and other individuals committed to enhancing Canada's counter-terrorism policies."

The petition itself informs the government that "the time has come, with the marking of the 25th anniversary of the Air India bombing in June and the 10th anniversary of 9/11 not far away, to see the legislation passed. The victims who have led this campaign have waited for far too long."

It also asks government that Bill S-7 "not become subject to other partisan considerations" and to "work with Canadian terror victims to ensure that effective legislation allowing for civil lawsuits against state and local sponsors of terror is passed expeditiously through Parliament without any further delays."

Though the government is now shut down for the summer months and will only reconvene in September, members of C-CAT say they want to use this time to accumulate 10,000 signatures on their petition and then present it in Parliament when it starts up again.

"We're on a push until then," Stacey Wintre, a Toronto entrepreneur and volunteer with C-CAT, told The CJN last month while soliciting signatures from people entering the Lipa Green building.

According to the rules of the House, any government-certified petition with a minimum of 25 signatures automatically obliges an MP to present it in the House of Commons.

Wintre said she became involved with C-CAT after hearing Liberal MP Irwin Cotler speak about the dangers of state-sponsored terrorism.

She said the C-CAT petition is positioned as a "request from the victims" in order to elicit action from the government.

Bill S-7 has gone through second reading in the House and is now being examined by the Special Senate Committee on Anti-Terrorism.

Mike Khards, another C-CAT volunteer and former senior fellow of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, said by working on this petition, he feels like he's performing a "mitzvah."

"This is an important agenda, not only for the Jewish community, but for everyone."

Middle East was at heart of Rights & Democracy crisis: report

Board objected to proposal to give grants to Palestinian and Israeli groups to monitor human rights in the region

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The board of crisis-ridden Rights & Democracy should be dismissed and the current members should apologize to the family of its late president, Rémy Beauregard, for "any statements damaging his reputation," says a report of the House of Commons standing committee on foreign affairs and international development.

The committee, which held hearings this past spring on the situation at the government-funded organization, concluded that Middle East politics played a role in the conflict that developed between Beauregard and other staff, and with board chair Aurel Braun and some directors:

"It is abundantly clear to the committee that a significant factor underlying the dispute between certain members of the board and Mr. Beauregard and the organization were differing views on the current dispute in the Middle East," the committee said.

The new members, the committee recommended, should be appointed in consultation with the opposition parties "to ensure an arm's-length, non-partisan board."

Aurel Braun

A recent majority on the agency's 13-member board of directors sided with Braun's criticism of the way Rights & Democracy was being run, while the overwhelming majority of the staff at the Montreal-based organization wanted Braun out because they felt he was imposing his personal views on the Arab-Israeli conflict and ruining Beauregard's reputation and the non-partisan mandate of the organization in the process.

The two main issues related to the Middle East was the board's objection to a staff proposal to give grants totalling $30,000 to non-governmental organizations – two Palestinian and one Israeli – to monitor human rights in the wake of the Israeli-Hamas war in Gaza. Braun regarded these groups as anti-Israel, with possible terrorist links.

Braun also alleged that Beauregard had made contact with Hezbollah and Hamas at a Cairo conference last year.

Beauregard's sudden death Jan. 8, the night after an acrimonious board meeting, brought to public attention the deepening divisions over the past year.

Rights & Democracy (formally the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development) was created by Parliament during Brian Mulroney's Progressive Conservative government in 1988.

In a dissenting opinion, the Conservative Party of Canada expressed its confidence in the board and thanked the members for "their perseverance during these difficult incidents." The party says it believes there is a broad consensus today between the board and staff on "roughly 98 per cent of all issues," noting that a five-year plan has been approved.

"While we worked diligently with opposition members to agree on the body of this report, we cannot support all the recommendations pushed through by the opposition majority on the committee," it writes.

After listening to "often contradictory narratives" of what happened at Rights & Democracy, the committee, chaired by Conservative MP Dean Allison, found that "several negative and erroneous allegations" regarding Beauregard's work were made in a performance review by Braun and two other board members that it wants expunged from the files.

The committee believes that "certain members of the board, in particular its chair… compromised the independence and integrity of the organization."

Beauregard, a career civil servant and former executive director of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, was appointed by the government in mid-2008. Braun, a University of Toronto professor, was appointed in March 2009.

Braun contended at the hearings that the proposal to give grants to the Mideast groups (which was ultimately rejected at the board meeting before Beauregard's death) followed a pattern of "delegitimating and dehumanizing a fellow democracy."

The organizations were Al Haq and Al Mezan in the Palestinian territories and B'Tselem in Israel.

Board member David Matas stated: "If we had a fully fledged Middle East program with balance on both sides, maybe B'Tselem would be somewhere in that mix, but to take three organizations all doing the same thing on the same side… It's out of context, it's not helpful."

The report said Beauregard refuted that he had met with terrorist group representatives in Cairo.

Beauregard felt that the cause of promoting civil rights in the region was so important that it might mean supporting organizations critical of Israel, the committee gleaned.

"It is clearly impossible to understand the depth of emotion underlying the dispute between members of the board and between the board and senior officials at Rights & Democracy without comprehending the deep differences of opinion on this important subject," the committee wrote.

Braun and certain other board members testified that his concerns about Rights & Democracy were more fundamental than its Middle East activities. He believed there was a longstanding lack of accountability and transparency on how its $11-million annual budget is spent, and that it's the board that should set overall policy direction, not the president or staff.

The committee recommended that the auditor general conduct a performance audit of Rights & Democracy every five years.

(Rights & Democracy was one of three Canadian NGOs cited as problematic with regard to Israel by Bar-Ilan University professor Gerald Steinberg's NGO Monitor website. The other two are Kairos and Alternatives, which lost their federal government funding in the past year. Rights & Democracy isn't a true NGO, the committee generally agreed.)

The committee recommended that the government should "publicly recommit to the independence and continuing role of Rights & Democracy in providing critical support for human rights and democratic development around the world," but it accepted that overall policy direction should be set by the board.

Group builds bridges between Israel, Diaspora

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — A group that builds bridges between the Diaspora and Israeli communities met in Atlantic Canada recently.

Canadian and Israeli members of the P2K Coast-to-Coast/Galilee Panhandle partnership met in Halifax on the June 18 weekend to discuss the connection between six Canadian cities and the Atlantic region with five towns and councils from Israel's north.

The group's in-coming Canadian co-chair Ron Weiss, an Ottawa physician, said the Canadian contingent, representing Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Ottawa, Hamilton and the Atlantic provinces, generates money through United Israel Appeal donations to fund projects in the Galilee.

"A few years ago, we began a major initiative to fund computer labs in Metulla elementary schools," Weiss said. "Within a year, they had 30 new computers, made videos, and even started a radio station where, on the floor, they painted a map of Vancouver Island, overlaid with a map of Israel, to show the similar size of each."

He said a partnership was developed with a high school whose students exchanged travel ventures with Canadian high schoolers. A dance troupe from Vancouver performed with Israeli dancers as well, he added.

"One of our main targets has been children at risk, and we've worked with philanthropic organizations and foundations to assist those," Weiss said. "In addition, we've initiated a new medical school in Tzfat, scheduled to open in 2011."

Andrea Freedman of Toronto, the national director of planning and development for UIA Canada, added, "We've narrowed our focus to three areas – building bridges, capacity building and youth and education. Projects are presented by the Galilee committee to the coast-to-coast committee each year, are vetted in terms of appropriateness, and decisions made. Of course, our Israeli counterparts have an essential role in guiding us."

The group's Israeli co-chair, who's entering the second year of a three-year term, is Guy Lipkin, a businessman from Moshav Sde Eliezer, a community 150 kilometres north of Tel Aviv. Lipkin said the committee structure in Israel has changed dramatically since P2K began. "At first, it was the mayors of the communities on the committee, but two years ago, we shifted from professional [political] participation to lay leadership. There are 40 partnerships between the Diaspora and Israel, but ours is the only one now with lay leadership. It makes a tremendous difference, as we look at the broad aspect for our region. Other partnerships are looking at our model now."

Lipkin said he has discovered the sense of Judaism abroad. "We are thrilled when delegations come to our area, from children to teachers and educators to lay leaders. Yes, we benefit from the funds, but it also strengthens our communities [to see the caring]. The projects focus on education, from youth to teaching leadership skills to mid-teens, through young adults who have completed their military service. We're working hard to keep our young people in our area rather than seeing them emigrate to larger centres."

He said his Israeli committee identifies the needs "because we live there," but the decision on what projects to undertake is made by the overall Canadian and Israeli groups.

Kathy Zilbert of Halifax, completing her three-year term as Canadian co-chair of the P2K Coast-to-Coast Partnership, says she has a stronger connection with P2K than any other volunteer group she's been associated with. "There have been many changes, particularly the global look the Israelis have toward projects in their region, rather than concentrating on their specific communities. The move to lay leadership has ensured that. Initially, it was a Canadian-driven partnership because we raised the funds and recommended where they should be used but now, because of lay leaders, it's really taken off."

The group spent a day touring and meeting at Camp Kadimah, where dozens of children from northern Israel have come for six-week terms in the last several years.

"I never saw such a camp," Lipkin said with awe in his voice. He laughed. "I want to go live there."

From left are Ron Weiss of Ottawa, incoming Canadian co-chair of the P2K Coast-to-Coast/Galilee Panhandle partnership, Kathy Zilbert of Halifax, the group's outgoing Canadian co-chair, and Guy Lipkin of Moshav Sde Eliezer, Israel, co-chair of the group's Galilee region.

Toronto school board committee recommends keeping controversial book

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Toronto District School Board (TDSB) staff committee is recommending that a controversial book about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict be retained in school libraries, but a Toronto school trustee is promising "this is not the final word on the book."

Ward 5 trustee James Pasternak said The Shepherd's Granddaughter violates the TDSB's own policy guidelines that advocates "civility, restraint, tolerance and working things out. For the book to suggest that violence can resolve issues is totally contrary to our policy."

The book, by award-winning Canadian author Anne Laurel Carter, was part of the Ontario Library Association's Forest of Reading/Red Maple program, which provides supplementary reading material to students in grades 7 and 8.

In March, York Region teacher Sarah Burakowski raised concerns with colleagues at the York Region School Board about the book's "one-sided" depiction of the conflict. The York board cautioned teacher-librarians to try to balance the book's message by providing context to ensure an "equitable learning environment free from bias and discrimination."

Similar concerns were voiced by a parent to the TDSB, prompting creation of an internal review committee.

Last week, the 11-person panel recommended that The Shepherd's Granddaughter continue to be available to school libraries to students in grades 7 and 8 for independent reading in school.

While acknowledging "the story is told from the point of view of a Palestinian family and the conflict is therefore seen primarily through their eyes," the committee argued that, "All texts are biased, written for specific purposes and audiences. The review committee recognized the clear bias represented by The Shepherd's Granddaughter. The review committee acknowledged that the novel portrays the Palestinians in a sympathetic light as compared to the Israelis depicted in the novel. However, it is in the nature of fiction to portray events through the thoughts, feelings and actions of their characters… Critical literacy questions encourage students to examine the nature and degree of bias in the texts they read. By the time they are in Grade 7 and 8, students will 'identify the point of view presented in texts, including increasingly complex or difficult texts; give evidence of any biases they may contain, and suggest other possible perspectives.'"

The committee recommended that teachers "continue to explicitly teach critical literacy skills and encourage critical thinking, so that students bring to the texts they read, independently and in class, the ability to detect bias, recognize point of view, explore complex and controversial issues from a variety of perspectives [and] inquire whether further into issues raised by the materials they read."

The committee also advised that titles in the Forest of Reading programs be reviewed by TDSB staff to identify issues "that may require additional support, exploration or access to complementary materials" and that teachers and teacher-librarians delivering an independent reading program receive the necessary resources to support dealing with controversial and sensitive subjects.

The recommendations were presented to TDSB education director Chris Spence, who will consult with trustees before making a decision, said Kelly Baker, communications coordinator for the board.

Pasternak said "the report is profoundly disappointing. I've been talking to trustees and we, as many as we can, will express our disappointment and disagreement with the report. Once director Spence has that information, he has to decide whether to accept or reject the recommendations of the review committee. We hope he rejects them."

Pasternak discounted suggestions the book simply offers students a window on the Middle East conflict. "It's a kids' book that advocates violence. It suggests violence is one option if you disagree with people, and there is no way we can present that option to children."

In a letter to fellow trustees, Pasternak said, "This is the second time in just over three years that the Ontario Library Association has recommended a book – the other was Three Wishes – that suggests to children that suicide bombing is an option when people disagree. Suicide bombing is a war crime."

Pasternak also rejected suggestions in the report that "as long as it is presented with critical thinking lens and a balanced curriculum, it's OK. The reality is kids will read it on their own without balance or a teacher. This book is to sit in libraries in middle school. There won't be teachers around and there won't be opportunities to talk to kids who take it out."

He also discounted arguments over censorship, saying the book will be available in bookstores and public libraries. "We are under no obligation to accept all books presented to our system," he said.

World Religions Summit hoped to advise G8, G20

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Religion can inform global policy-making, a New York rabbi told a summit of world religious leaders here last week.

"I believe that religious traditions have something to contribute to discussions concerning public policy on an international basis," Rabbi Richard Marker told delegates to the World Religions Summit, held in Winnipeg from June 21 to June 23, ahead of the G8 and G20 summits in Ontario.

"The challenge for us as religious leaders is to get beyond platitudes and use the depth of our knowledge to bring about concrete action."

Rabbi Richard Marker

Rabbi Marker, vice-chair of the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations, was one of several Jewish delegates from among about 80 high-profile religious leaders from around the world who attended the gathering with the goal of sending a unified message to leaders of the G8 and G20 nations.

That message was to urge governments to remain true to the eight millennium development goals ratified by the 192 member states of the United Nations 10 years ago. The goals aim to halve global poverty by 2015.

Rabbi Stanley Gutow
[Myron Love photos]

This was the first time Canada has played host to the World Religions Summit for interfaith leaders in G8 nations. A 2005 forerunner event in the United Kingdom united Christian faith traditions around the G8 summit and set the stage for subsequent interfaith gatherings.

At the Winnipeg summit, religious communicators met to hear speakers and discuss how current issues of faith are represented in the popular media, as well as debate human rights and religious freedom from the perspective of poverty, the environment and peace and security.

Among the 80 delegates were representatives from all Christian faith traditions, as well as from Islam, Buddhism, aboriginal faiths, Hinduism, Sikhism, Baha'i, Shintoism and Judaism.

In addition to Rabbi Marker, the Jewish world was represented by Rabbi Adam Scheier, president of the Montreal Board of Rabbis and spiritual leader of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Westmount; Rabbi Stanley Gutow, president and CEO of the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, the public policy and community relations co-ordinating agency of the American Jewish community, and Benjamin Shinewald, national executive director and general counsel for Canadian Jewish Congress.

"Those were two very intense days," Rabbi Scheier said. "We were exposed to other religious traditions we wouldn't normally come in contact with in Montreal," he added, citing, for example, an aboriginal presenter and female African minister.

"While time will tell how successful we will be at getting our message out to the G20 leaders, for the delegates, we were forced to move out of our comfort zones and interact with interesting people we wouldn't normally have had the opportunity to interact with."

Shinewald added that the religious conference was an "exciting opportunity to come together with representatives of other religious communities and discover how much we have in common."

Rabbi Gutow felt that it was good for the Jewish world to be represented at such a summit. "Although discussions concerning Israel and anti-Semitism were not on the agenda, there were undoubtedly people in the room who are antagonistic to us and might have tried to control things if we weren't represented," he said.

Rabbi Marker agreed with Rabbi Gutow about the importance of having Jewish voices at the table. "It looked like the organizers were being careful," he said. "The talks focused on what brings us together rather than what divides us."

Rabbi Marker found the discussions to be quite interesting, but he wasn't sure that anything authoritative came out of them. "We are dealing with profound questions concerning the relationship between human beings and the environment and the division of natural resources," he said. "Religious traditions have something to say about this, but what we have to say must be meaningful, not trite."

Rabbi Gutow also thought that it's important for religious leaders to make their voices heard on issues such as world peace, immigration, poverty and the environment. "It's our job as religious leaders to speak out on behalf of those who are underrepresented in society," he said.

NEW CYCLING TRAIL FROM JERUSALEM TO TEL AVIV: The Keren Kayemeth L'Israel – Jewish National Fund inaugurated the Sea to Jerusalem cycling trail on June 4. The trail was made possible thanks to a $1.4-million donation from the Lebovic brothers, Wolf and Joseph, of Toronto. Winnipeg high school celebrates 100th anniversary

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the first half of its existence and more, St. John's Tech (as it was known for the first 50 years) was the high school for countless Jewish students growing up in Winnipeg.

The extent of the school's Jewish population can be gauged from the number of its outstanding graduates over the years. They include members of the Order of Canada such as Justice Samuel Freedman (class of 1924); his brother, journalist Maxwell Freedman (class of '25); former Manitoba provincial cabinet ministers Saul Cherniak (class of '33) and Roland Penner (class of '41.)

Others include leading Canadian civil servant Bernard Ostry (class of '43) and his wife, economist Sylvia (Knelman) Ostry (class of '43); journalist Val Werier (class of '34); world-class chess player Abe Yanofsky (class of '41); and lawyer Sol Kanee (class of '26), former president of Canadian Jewish Congress and chair of World Jewish Congress.

Many of the Jewish graduates came back to celebrate their school's 100th birthday the weekend of June 17 to 20.

The weekend included a gathering at the school, a social at the Canad Inns Polo Park and a gala banquet featuring graduate Monty Hall (class of '37), an alumni choir, the St. John's Jazz Choir, jazz singer Colleen Savage (class of '67), and the Burton Cummings Band (Cummings attended the school in the mid-1960s.)

Sunday morning there was a pancake breakfast, and class photos continued all day. Over the weekend there was also a stamp exhibition, a military ceremony commemorating the St. John's students who gave their lives in service to their country and several presentations by author Russ Gourluck talking about his new book on the North End.

Off site, the Rady Jewish Community Centre held a get-together for graduates who were also YMHA members, and there was a video link-up with 50 St. John's graduates who now live in Israel.

For former students such as oral surgeon Dr. David Rusen (class of '66); Kitty (Weinberg) Silver (class of '38); and Hy Dashevsky (class of '49) and his wife, the former Esther Dubnicoff (class of '55); the highlight of the weekend was getting together with people they hadn't seen at least since the last reunion 25 years ago, and in some cases, a lot longer. (The Dashevksys actually met at the school's 50th anniversary reunion.)

Esther (Dubnicoff) Dashevky noted that she lived right across the street from the school. "I used to be able to get to school in minutes," she said. "I made many lifelong friends at St. John's."

David Rusen remembered his time at St. John's as among the best years of his life. "I went to St. John's for six years," he recalled. "I was in the first Grade 7 class. I always enjoyed coming to school."

It was a feeling that Beryl (Pearlman) Moser (class of '49), shares. She remembered always being eager to get to school in the morning. "I participated in everything," recalled Moser, who lives in Montreal. "I was on the basketball and volleyball teams and was a cheerleader. I am very excited to be here."

Toronto realtor Barbara (Silver) Jerome (class of '67) fondly remembered the ballroom dancing lessons in gym class and participating in the school operettas.

She was also excited to see one of her teachers, Wally Holowka. "He remembered me," she said.

Martin Yaffe (also class of '67) credited his science teacher, the late Bernie Melman, for stimulating his interest in the sciences. Yaffe is a professor and researcher in medical biophysics at the University of Toronto, senior scientist in imaging research at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre in Toronto, and a consultant physicist for the Ontario Breast Screening Program. He developed a digital technology that can detect breast cancer at an earlier stage.

St. John's High School graduate Barbara (Silver) Jerome and her husband, Harry, came from Toronto for the school's 100th anniversary reunion.

"The quality of education we received here, and some of the extracurricular programs, you didn't find anywhere else in Winnipeg at that time," he said.

Joannie Fridell was a student (class of '68) and a teacher at St. John's ('74-'92.) She and Alex Carr, who taught sciences at the school from 1967 to 1997, recalled that there was a feeling of family among the teachers. "Many of the teachers were long-time staff members," said Carr, who now lives in Kelowna, B.C.

"We were a close-knit staff," Fridell added. She also praised the quality of the principals and vice-principals in her time at the school, citing in particular Henry Promislow, who was vice-principal for many years.

When Carr started teaching at the school, he said, the student population was about 2,200. By the time he left, the student population had declined to about 1,100, reflecting the decline in the neighbourhood and dropping enrolments across the city.

One of St. John's oldest graduates in attendance at the reunion was Harry Walsh. The 96-year-old philanthropist – who graduated in 1929 – is one of Canada's longest serving and best known trial lawyers as well as having been a Jewish community leader. It was only fitting that for the closing ceremony, Walsh was chosen to pass the torch to a student representing the current generation of students as St. John's High School sets forth on its second 100 years.

Teachers union promotes boycott

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — One of the province's largest teachers unions – the Fédération nationale des enseignantes et des enseignants du Québec (FNEEQ) – recently devoted more than one-third of its in-house magazine – seven of 20 pages – to condemning Israel and supporting the international boycott, divestment, sanctions (BDS) campaign against it.

While a Quebec union being unfriendly to Israel may come as no surprise, the spring issue of Carnets stood out for the scope of its polemics and its use of vitriolic language.

Some examples:

- The 1947 United Nations Partition Plan for Palestine was the start of "the naqba, the ethnic cleansing of Palestine;"
- Palestinians "in the 'Jewish democracy'… are constantly threatened with expulsion and dispossession because they are not Jewish";
- Israel is a "rogue state," and "use of the term 'Israel apartheid' is not rhetorical."

The FNEEQ plans to promote its agenda this October in Montreal at the second Quebec Social Forum. The event receives public funding from the city and the province.

Quebec Jewish Congress executive director Daniel Amar didn't address the specifics of the Carnets publication, but said the BDS campaign is "absurd, counterproductive… and indicative of the cynicism" of several people who support the BDS campaign, notably Denis Kosseim, a member of FNEEQ's international action committee, which formulates the union's position on "Israel-Palestine"; Québec Solidaire MNA Amir Khadir; and Réjean Parent, head of the Centrale des syndicats du Québec.

Tips for summer travelling

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

When my children were young, we often travelled by car and our trips were always culinary adventures. The most important thing was what was in the cooler. As soon as our car turned the corner, the kids immediately declared, "We're hungry! Let's eat!"

When my sister and I were young, we also loved to go on car trips. My mother always packed the best cooler. Her standard selection included pastrami, corned beef and garlicky salami sandwiches with tomato and hot mustard on fresh rye; and chopped egg sandwiches (some with onion, some with olives). She sometimes included cold sliced hamburger or chicken sandwiches, once again with tomato slices – Mom wanted to be sure we ate our vegetables. Salmon salad sandwiches with sliced cucumber and onions were sometimes included, but rarely tuna – no one in our family liked tuna very much.

Mom also packed apples, oranges, bananas and of course, homemade cookies such as her komishbroit and chocolate chip cookies. Cinnamon buns were another big favourite with our family. Memories of those terrific car trips still linger in our collective memories.

In the summer, we usually travelled to a rented cottage at Winnipeg Beach but that was a short trip, only 50 miles away. It seems like my mom took our whole kitchen in the car! Our beach cottage had no running water, no refrigeration and no indoor plumbing, but there was an icebox and a wood stove. There was no shortage of fresh pickerel from the nearby lake, fresh vegetables and fruit from the local farmer, meat from the kosher butcher… and we ate to our heart's content. It was "eating local" at its best!

Today travel is somewhat different, but some things remain the same. When I asked some of my friends what they take with them on their family travels, they told me that they usually pack an insulated bag with bagels, cream cheese and lox, party sandwiches or chopped egg, tuna, cheese or peanut butter sandwiches. Deli sandwiches are a favourite for a meat meal, with sliced deli turkey or chicken offered as healthier choices, sometimes done as a wrap. Juice boxes and concentrated juice containers can be frozen to act as ice packs and then the defrosted juice can be enjoyed. Veggies often include baby carrots, cherry or grape tomatoes and miniature cucumbers packed in resealable bags – moms still focus on getting vegetables into their kids! Chocolate chip cookies are always popular, along with fruit – apples, grapes, bananas, plums – and individual containers of yogurt.

When my sons travelled from Montreal to Toronto recently for a family visit, their coolers were jam-packed with food for the six-hour trip, along with freezer packs to keep everything well-chilled. They brought sandwiches, bagels, veggie burgers, yogurt, hummus, potato chips, blueberries, strawberries, carrots and mini-cucumbers, chocolate and cinnamon Danish, poppy seed and chocolate chip cookies, juice boxes, bottled water, plus plastic cutlery and wipes. If they had travelled by plane, I'm sure the cost for overweight baggage would be more than the price of the airline tickets!

If you are travelling to a rented cottage, there are additional challenges to consider. Organization and advance planning are the keys to having a happy holiday, so it's a good idea to keep an updated list from one year to the next. Here are some helpful tips to help simplify things so that you really will have a holiday when you arrive at your destination!

• A "vacation box" can be packed with inexpensive kitchen equipment so that it won't matter if you lose something – but the equipment should be of decent enough quality to work properly:

1 dairy skillet (preferably nonstick)
1 pot for pasta along with a colander (preferably collapsible)
1 pot for boiling eggs
1 soup pot and 1 skillet for meat
1 pot for cooking vegetables
A big salad bowl (or two)
Disposable cutting boards
A couple of decent knives
A ladle, tongs, measuring equipment
A few mixing bowls, spoons and spatulas
A grater, vegetable peeler and cheese slicer
New sponge and scrubbies

• To save on shlepping, buy paper goods (disposable paper plates, plastic cutlery, glasses, cups, napkins), plastic wrap and foil at the local supermarket or dollar store when you arrive at your destination. You can also buy disposable foil containers for roasting chicken, meats, vegetables, etc.

• To be "green" use reusable or recyclable dishes. Consider bringing an unbreakable set of cheap dishes and inexpensive cutlery with you. There are also collapsible dishes that pack easily.

• Pack seasonings, herbs and spices in small containers or ziploc bags: salt, pepper, garlic powder, onion flakes, basil/oregano, paprika, instant chicken soup mix, cinnamon. Keep it simple – and be sure to seal the bags well!

• Pack individual size packets of mustard, ketchup, mayonnaise, peanut butter, jam. No refrigeration needed.

• Buy perishables such as yogurt, cheeses, margarine and milk when you arrive at your destination. Fresh fruits and vegetables can also be bought at any supermarket or corner grocery store. Pasta, rice and other grains are easily available. Consider special dietary needs such as gluten-free diets, allergies and diabetic choices before you leave for your trip.

• Include Shabbat candles, matches and wine. A box of matzah can be used if kosher bread isn't available.

• Bring food for a quick, simple meal when you arrive: bagel, breakfast cereal, a whole salami, tuna in pouches, canned salmon, sardines, beans and corn – and don't forget the can opener!

• Meal Suggestions: Pack a cooler with frozen meats and poultry that's been double-wrapped. Prepare double portions of whatever you're eating for dinner a few weeks before your trip: lasagna, meatballs or hamburgers, brisket, chicken and salmon patties are good choices. Label clearly, double wrap and freeze them until you're ready to leave. Pack tightly with frozen concentrated juice containers in a cooler or designated suitcase lined with a plastic garbage bag. Place the food in the freezer as soon as you arrive at your destination. If tightly packed, it will probably stay frozen.

• Hopefully, there's a microwave oven at your destination. It's very easy to kosher one and you can prepare eggs, fish, potatoes and other vegetables easily, as well as reheating and defrosting foods in a hurry.

Safe travels and happy holidays. Enjoy!

CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIES

Oat-so-good! This recipe comes from my favourite (and only) daughter, Jodi Sprackman, who is an excellent cook and baker. My granddaughters call them "Jodi's Oaties!"

1/2 cup soft tub margarine
1/2 cup lightly packed brown sugar
1/4 cup granulated sugar
1 large egg
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
3/4 cup whole wheat flour
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
1 1/2 cups quick-cooking oats (preferably large flake)
3/4 to 1 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips

Preheat the oven to 350. Line 2 large baking sheets with parchment paper. In a food processor fitted with the steel blade, combine the margarine, sugars, egg and vanilla; process for 2 minutes or until well-blended. Add the flour, baking soda, salt and oats; process with quick on/off pulses, just until combined. Stir in the chocolate chips with a rubber spatula.

Drop from a teaspoon onto the prepared baking sheets, leaving 2 inches between each cookie. Bake for 12 to 15 minutes or until golden. Cool for 5 minutes, then remove from pan. Yield: About 44 cookies. Recipe can be doubled easily. Freezes well for up to 4 months.

ANIMATOR GETS LOST IN HER GAME

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Meredith Kinrys has created a monster. Well, she's created many monsters.

Kinrys, 23, is the designer for the iPhone game Monster Dice Theatre. In the game, which was recently released, players throw dice at tomato-hurling monsters, all of whom Kinrys drew and helped animate.

"It's fun and simple, but still addictive," Kinrys said of the game. "If you're playing it, you can get lost in it... I'm happy with the art, it's supposed to be arcade-like."

The gaming artist/animator, who is currently doing freelance work, first got into computer animation because of a career aptitude test.

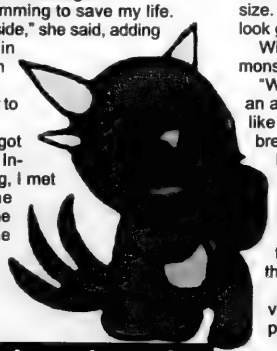
"In Grade 10, we had to take one of those [career] surveys and my number 1 [career suggestion] was computer animator and I thought, 'That is exactly what I want to do,'" Kinrys said.

So she did. After high school, the artist attended Seneca College's animation arts program, where she learned about animation and design.

"I couldn't do programming to save my life. I'm focused on the arts side," she said, adding that she's interested in video game animation and character design.

Which is what led her to Monster Dice Theatre.

"After I graduated, I got an internship at Heroic Interactive. While interning, I met a couple of guys. One had just made an iPhone game with a friend... he was really successful. We were all like, 'Oh, this could be something,'" she said.



After Kinrys finished her internship at Heroic Interactive, a computer game company, Daniel Yu, an iPhone game designer, gave her a call.

"[He] contacted myself and other programmers there to work on a game with him. I was the artist," she said.

Kinrys, Yu and Josh Yaw, who was in charge of programming and coding, spent more than half a year working on the game.

For her part, Kinrys designed and animated the characters in Monster Dice Theatre. This included creating the monsters, the tomatoes and the backgrounds for the game.

"I figured out how they would look and move... it was a tricky process... [Yu] said the monster characters [should look] cute but kind of scary. I can do cute and scary, but it was a matter of figuring out the size. An iPhone is small. You have to make sure it'll look good for that style," she said.

While Kinrys drew many different versions of the monsters, nothing felt right.

"When someone tells you to do something, as an artist, it's hard to get something out there they'll like right away," she said. "I'll keep trying, take a break, sleep on it. When I'm feeling refreshed and I haven't thought about it too much, then it'll click... it'll eventually come to you in some sort of magic moment."

Kinrys' magic moment led to horned, multi-coloured, animal-like creatures. Some have three tails, some have muscles and all enjoy throwing tomatoes.

While Kinrys doesn't necessarily like playing video games more than watching TV, she does prefer designing video game characters.

"I tend to like the style of video games more. Animation can be very simple and cartoony, whereas in video games, you're looking at cool characters," she said.

Kinrys' penchant for art started in middle school, when she realized she liked sketching more than she liked listening to her teachers.

"I also had one or two friends that already knew they were artists. They were drawing and sketching all the time. I wanted to be like that," she said. "I still feel like I'm an artist doing artist work."

While Kinrys is continuing to freelance, she currently works on the other side of the gaming industry, selling video games at EB Games.

Meredith Kinrys helped create the iPhone game Monster Dice Theatre.

"It's not the end I wanted to be on," she said. "My goal right now is to get a job working at a studio full-time. My ideal would be to work at a video game animation studio."

But this isn't as simple as it sounds.

"The thing about the video game industry is... it's sort of hard to break into... 10, 20 years ago, it was such a new industry that, as long as you wanted to be in it, you just were," she said.

"Nowadays, it's grown so popular... There's so many people who are really good at what they do, it's not just a matter of wanting to get in... they already want you to have the experience coming out of school."

Kinrys is trying to get that experience through projects such as Monster Dice Theatre, but the game hasn't been as well received as she hoped.

"We don't have anyone in marketing, which is a problem. The market [used to be] really small for iPhone games. Now that ours has come out... there's so many games out there that unless you have a lot of marketing behind it, it's really hard to get your game noticed."

So far, Kinrys and the team have been posting on forums and depending on word-of-mouth to sell their game.

For more information about the game, visit www.monsterdicetheatre.com.

AEPi launches alumni club

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

Alpha Epsilon Pi Fraternity (AEPi) launched its Toronto Alumni Club at a brunch on June 20. The inaugural event coincided with the 25th anniversary of the fraternity in Ontario.

Since opening at the University of Western Ontario in 1985, AEPi has grown to become Canada's largest fraternity.

With more than 400 active members at campuses across the country and an alumni base approaching the thousands, the inception of the Alumni Club will facilitate networking between members, while providing a support structure for current undergraduate chapters.

"Sunday's brunch was an amazing success, with over 60 alumni attending, and on Father's Day no less," said Noam Berlin, an AEPi alumni from McMaster University who helped organize the event. "It marks the largest start of an Alumni Club in AEPi's 97-year history."

A short program during the brunch included messages from representatives of the Canadian AEPi chapters, as well as a raffle of prizes donated by esteemed alumni. AEPi's executive director, Andrew Borans, along with international president, Mark Schiff and Supreme Exchequer Larry Leider, were present to officially start up the club.

Open to any alumni of any AEPi chapter, the club will provide social and business networking opportunities, engage in international philanthropies and help undergraduate chapters in the surrounding area.

It will also be an opportunity to reconnect with old friends, make new ones and get involved in the creation of the first AEPi Alumni Network in Canada.

"The Alumni Club will provide a job and mentor bank for the undergraduates who will soon be looking for jobs and a network for current alumni to exchange information on jobs as well share information on Jewish life, family life, community events and travel," said Borans.

In addition to uniting alumni members, the brunch commemorated the fraternity's first ever large-scale collaboration with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. In a short ceremony during the brunch, Borans and Schiff presented federation officials with a cheque for over $12,000 to go towards the organization's fundraising campaign for the federation's Walk With Israel.

"Our mandate as a Jewish organization is to develop leaders for our community," said Berlin. "AEPi has become a unique outlet to engage the best and brightest Jewish leaders on university campuses."

While the Toronto Alumni Club was being created, Berlin said, a small group of undergraduates and alumni led by Joshua Rosen, Jesse Cohen and Aryeh Sand from the University of Toronto chapter, found another avenue for the leadership skills they had learned in the fraternity.

"Since AEPi has historically been a strong supporter of many local and Israeli causes, Walk With Israel struck us as a unique opportunity to fuse two of our main focuses into a large event that will help us strengthen ties with the Jewish community."

Like B'nai Brith, Chabad, Gift of Life and Hillel, Borans said, Federation is one of AEPi's partner agencies.

Borans said AEPi has "incredible Canadian alumni," including former Liberal MP Herb Gray; two of Israel's Canadian ambassadors, Hiam Divon and Alan Baker; as well as the immediate past president of B'nai Brith International, Moishe Smith.

For Berlin, being an AEPi alumni "means you're a strong, passionate Jewish adult that is able to lead both Jewish and secular communities to greater things. The sense of dedication felt [at the brunch] was something I always spoke of, and seeing it with my own eyes was truly fulfilling."

Health benefits of volunteer work studied

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

One year after putting out the call, Baycrest is still searching for subjects for a study to determine the health benefits of volunteer work.

The goal is to explore whether volunteering affects brain health, as well as to make Baycrest the agency of choice for volunteers, according to a June 15 slide show presented mostly to volunteers to mark the one-year anniversary of the study's launch.

The study is called Baycrest Research About Volunteering in Older Adults, or BRAVO for short.

Its hypothesis is that volunteering should protect against cognitive decline, and that more complex volunteer positions produce a greater gain, explained Nicole Anderson, a psychologist involved in the study and a scientist in Baycrest's Kunin-Lunenfeld Applied Research Unit.

Investigating the benefits of individual volunteer jobs has never been done before, she added.

"Volunteering has an amazing effect on the individual," said Lesley Miller, volunteer leadership chair for BRAVO, adding that she's seen people become more energetic, confident and cheerful after their volunteer experience.

"Everybody knows anecdotally that most people benefit from volunteer work, but this is a really scientific way of studying it," said Susan Dane, a leadership volunteer who began working with Baycrest in 2007.

One interesting aspect to the study is that all of the leadership volunteers are considered seniors, since they're all at least 55 years old, she added. "You've got seniors testing seniors."

The research involves putting volunteers through a series of physical, cognitive and social tests.

One physical test, for example, asks a subject to walk as far as he or she can in six minutes. The test is performed at the start of the volunteer period, then again six months in and at the one-year completion mark, Anderson said.

Studies have already proven that there are brain health benefits to physical and mental exercise, as well as social interaction.

"You could join a walking program or a book club," Anderson said, "but the nice thing about volunteering is you get all of those benefits, and it's a win-win. You're helping people at the same time."

As of the anniversary presentation, 43 people have been enrolled in the program, and the goal is to find 200 participants.

"We have a big challenge to overcome," said Tony Fattal, a volunteer who's primarily involved in marketing the study. "One of the things is that we are looking for a very specific type of individual."

The volunteers have to be at least 55 years old, retired, not currently volunteering in a formal setting more than three or fours hours per month, and willing to spend about three hours per week at Baycrest for one year.

"Usually people who are busy and interested are already doing something," said Syrelle Bernstein, Baycrest's director of volunteer services, adding that the most promising group has been new retirees looking to get involved.

Even if someone doesn't fit the criteria, they can still volunteer at Baycrest, Bernstein said, explaining that she has recruited more than 100 people since advertising the study.

People who are newly retired may find the experience especially rewarding, Miller said.

Anybody interested in joining the study should contact Bernstein at 416-785-2500 ext. 2577.

Seniors over-medicated: Baycrest CEO

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Seniors living in residential care can still go through a period of personal growth, says William Reichman, president and CEO of Baycrest.

"Our world, at first, is small. Then it expands, and then it contracts. Our mental health challenge is to change that."

Reichman was a keynote speaker at the Dr. Ira Pollock Clinic Day, held June 4 at the Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre.

Other speakers included Dr. Michael Gordon, medical program director for palliative care at Baycrest, who delivered the Wulf Grobin Memorial Lecture on "End of Life Care in Dementia"; Dr. Robert Josse, who spoke on osteoporosis, and Dr. Brian Murray, who spoke on sleep disorders in the older adult.

Reichman, a professor of psychiatry in the University of Toronto's faculty of medicine, said that for too many years, seniors living in residential care have been overmedicated.

He said that that was the case when he co-wrote a book on the state of psychiatric care in nursing homes about a decade ago, and now that he is editing a second book on the subject, "I'm not seeing significant progress. There have not been enough advances in treating mental health challenges.

"Nursing homes are de facto geriatric mental institutions, and I'm concerned about where the field is going. We need to shift away from the heavy medical approach."

Quality of life depends on a number of factors, he said, including mood, cognition, family, spiritual needs, culture, and the environment.

"Good physical health is important, but it's not enough. We all need activities that are satisfying. When we admit a resident, to what extent do we think about who this person is? What is their core identity?"

He said that we pay attention to pain management and continence, "but do we pay attention to other matters? From what means did this person extract a sense of purpose? [We need to know] what they did to attach themselves to the world around them. No drug will reduce our need to have a sense of purpose."

He said that today's seniors need practical suggestions about how they can get themselves back to where they want to be.

Foster kids can enrich families

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Jonathan received a scholarship to attend graduate school, he credited his foster parents with helping him make it happen.

A child of alcoholics who neglected him when he was young, Jonathan (not his real name) said he "landed on his feet" because of the stable life he was given by both his foster family and Jewish Family & Child.

Now Jonathan mentors other youth and shares with them the benefits of his experience.

Howard Hurwitz, director of children's services at JF&CS, wants to spread the word that fostering not only benefits the kids but it also enriches the lives of families.

"I'm hoping to engage more families in the community to get involved. We're always in need. We've had to put some kids in group homes or place them outside of the community, because we just don't have enough homes."

Fostering can transform the lives of kids who come from adverse circumstances, he said. "We have a large number of kids in our care who cannot live with their birth parents because of [a number of reasons].

"Sometimes these parents approach us themselves, or the kids may be identified by a teacher, family member or friend."

JF&CS has a 12-year-old boy in care, he said, who was raised by foster parents because his birth parents have a chronic mental illness and can't look after him.

"The foster parents made an incredible commitment, and the boy has thrived in their care. Their extended family has embraced him, and they have kept him connected to the Jewish community.

"On the flip side, though, this boy has enriched their lives. They've given their birth children an awareness and an appreciation of helping those less fortunate, and he has become part of their family."

He said that the agency encourages the involvement of the natural parents, and their goal is to return children to them. "In some cases, the children cannot return home, but where feasible, they do remain in contact."

Sheryl Ederman, supervisor, resource development and support team at JF&CS, said that when foster parents take in a child, they become part of a team. "They are co-parents along with the agency and the natural parents.

"We train [foster families] in such areas as understanding the biological family and managing the child. These kids come with baggage, and we want to help families work with them."

She said that JF&CS performs a number of checks on foster families before the families take in children. "We look at the family situation, and determine what they can bring to the table as foster parents. We need to know who is parenting these kids."

They've found that some of the best foster parents are those who were challenged as kids, she said. "They've developed well and are now in a position to provide a strong parenting situation."

Erica Stern, a single parent with a 12-year-old son, took in two foster siblings, ages eight and nine, for one year, until the siblings recently went to live with their grandparents.

"These were my first foster children, and I approached the agency because of an article I read in The Canadian Jewish News," she said.

"I thought that [Jacob and I] had a stable lifestyle, and that we were ready to open up our hearts and our home. We also have an awesome extended family, including Jacob's father and stepmother, and they were all involved."

She said that having foster siblings gave Jacob the experience of having other kids around. "He learned different skills, such as problem solving, negotiating and sharing. It was a great experience, and we'd certainly do it again."

Jacob said that "when my mom asked me about [taking in foster children], I told her we have enough love."

Joel and Lisa Jakobovits, who have three of their own children, ages three, 10 and 12, have had two long-term foster children who are now above the age of fostering, but have remained part of their family.

The oldest child, now studying at Bar Ilan University, had a number of issues when she arrived, Joel Jakobovits said, "but she has pulled herself together. We are looking forward to her coming home [soon.]"

He said that he and his wife decided to take in foster children when they were told that there was a shortage of Orthodox foster homes. "I talked it over with my wife, and we went to an information evening. We took the training, and before we knew it, they had a child for us, and asked us to take her sister as well. We went from zero to two foster children real quick."

He said the experience has been "mostly positive," adding that sometimes his eldest daughter "feels displaced because on Shabbat we give our kids brachot according to age, and she was always first.

"They learned a lot, though. They understand that not everyone is as privileged as they are, and they learn to get along with others."

He knew it was all worthwhile, he said, when at 18 years old, the older foster child came to him and broke out crying. "She said we saved her life, and that she was a shell before we came along. It was unexpected and unbelievable."

CUTTING THEIR LOCKS FOR A GOOD CAUSE

Associated Hebrew Schools students Madison Shields, who is in Grade 4 (left) and Robyn Berns, who is in Grade 7, recently donated their hair to charity. Madison, who grew her hair for three years, donated it to Wigs for Kids, a non-profit organization that provides wigs to children who have lost their hair after medical treatment. Robyn cut 10 inches off her hair to donate to Zichron Menachem in Israel, which also makes wigs for sick children.

Turkey closes its air space to IDF

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Turkey has closed its airspace to Israeli military flights following the raid on a Gaza-bound aid ship, the Turkish prime minister and officials said Monday.

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan told reporters in Toronto that Turkey imposed the ban after the May 31 raid on a Turkish ship that was part of a six-vessel international aid flotilla, according to the state-run Anatolia news agency.

Erdogan, who was in Toronto to attend the Group of 20 summit of major industrial and developing nations, did not elaborate.

On Sunday, Israeli media reported that Turkey had not allowed a plane carrying Israeli military officers, en route to a tour of memorial sites in Auschwitz, Poland, to fly over Turkish airspace.

The transport plane, with more than 100 commissioned and non-commissioned officers on board, was forced to make a detour, the report said.

According to reports, the Israel Defence Forces refrained from responding officially to the event in order not to exacerbate the rift in relations.

Turkish aviation officials were not immediately available for comment.

Eight Turks and a Turkish-American were killed in the raid, drawing Turkish outrage and widespread international condemnation.

The aid ships were sailing to Gaza to break an Israeli blockade imposed to keep weapons and other military components out of the hands of Gaza militants who have attacked Israel with bombs, rockets and mortars for years.

Israel insists troops involved in the deadly raid acted in self-defence after they were attacked by some of the activists on board.

Turkey, which had a close alliance with Israel until the three-week Gaza war that ended in early 2009, withdrew its ambassador and cancelled joint military drills in response to the raid. It has said it will not return its ambassador and will reduce military and trade ties unless Israel apologizes for the raid.

Recep Tayyip Erdogan

It also wants Israel to return the seized aid ships, agree to an international investigation and offer compensation for the victims.

"Up to now, we have done whatever is necessary within the rules of law, whether national or international, and we will continue to do so," Anatolia quoted Erdogan as saying, adding that ties with Israel could return to normal if Israel meets Turkey's demands.

Erdogan said: "We are not interested in making a show. We don't desire such a thing, and we have been very patient in the face of these developments," Anatolia reported.

Israel has objected to an international inquiry into the operation and has set up its own investigative commission that includes two foreign observers.

Wiesel working to free former Yukos oil exec

JTA

MOSCOW — Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel has launched a global campaign to free former Russian oil tycoon Mikhail Khodorkovsky, who is on trial in Moscow for embezzlement.

On the eve of Russian President Dmitry Medvedev's visit to the United States, Wiesel held a lunch June 24 for several dozen prominent Americans, to discuss how to pressure Russian leadership to release Khodorkovsky, whom Wiesel called a political prisoner.

"We all believe it is a political case," Wiesel said at the meeting. "He is not legally convicted."

U.S. President Barack Obama and Medvedev reportedly did not discuss Khodorkovsky's case during their meeting on the same day.

Khodorkovsky, the former head of the Yukos Oil Company, is serving an eight-year sentence in a prison colony for fraud and tax evasion. He faces another 22 years in prison for theft and embezzlement if convicted of stealing $9.6 billion (US) from the $15.8-billion profit generated by Yukos between 1999 and 2003, as well as 350 million tons of oil.

Elena Bonner, a prominent Russian human rights activist and public figure, who was also invited to the lunch but was not able to participate, published an open letter to the participants saying that their initiative was noble but they should not forget other political prisoners in Russia.

Leonid Nevzlin, Khodorkovsky's former partner who immigrated to Israel in 2004, in his blog on Live Journal agreed with Bonner, the wife of the late dissident and Nobel Peace Prize laureate Andrei Sakharov, saying that the focus on political prisoners in Russia should not be solely on Khodorkovsky.

Iranian flotilla departure postponed

JTA

JERUSALEM — The departure of a Gaza-bound Iranian ship carrying aid and activists has been postponed after Egypt said it would prevent the ship from using the Suez Canal.

"The ship's departure has been postponed because of more restrictions imposed by the Zionist Quds occupying regime on the movement of aid to Gaza and prevention of the ship from using the Suez Canal, despite co-ordination with international bodies," the Red Crescent said in a statement faxed to the French news agency AFP.

A Suez Canal Authority official told AFP, however, that it would allow the ship to pass, per the requirements of an international treaty.

On June 24, an Iranian official announced that the departure of the aid ship had been cancelled due to restrictions imposed by Israel.

Israel sent a letter to the United Nations last week saying that if Iranian and Lebanese ships enter the water off Gaza's coast, Israel would consider it a declaration of war and react.

Two ships had been scheduled to leave on Sunday.

Iran reportedly still plans to send aid to Gaza by plane and through Egyptian borders.

Morocco stymies terrorists

Israeli media reported that Moroccan security police arrested 11 men who reportedly planned to carry out terror attacks at Jewish and tourist sites in the country. The four Palestinians and seven Moroccans, reportedly a cell of Islamic Jihad, were arrested last week, according to the Berlin-based International Institute for Education and Research on Anti-Semitism, which cited the Moroccan newspaper Al Ahdath Al Maghrebia. Targets reportedly included tourist sites, as well as Jewish and pro-Israel activists.

Flotilla efforts irresponsible: U.S.

Israeli media reported that the Obama administration said that sending sea-bound aid to Gaza is "irresponsible." "Mechanisms exist for the transfer of humanitarian assistance to Gaza by member states and groups that want to do so," a U.S. State Department release said in response to a reporter's question about Lebanese plans to ship aid to Gaza. "Direct delivery by sea is neither appropriate nor responsible, and certainly not effective, under the circumstances." On May 31, Israel raided an aid flotilla attempting to breach its blockade of Gaza, imposed to squeeze its Hamas terrorist leadership. Five boats were rerouted peacefully, but clashes aboard a sixth, Turkish-flagged ship resulted in the deaths of nine passengers and the wounding of seven Israeli troops, setting off international outcry. Since then, Israel has loosened the blockade to let in all goods except for those that could provide Hamas with arms.

Greeks sue Israel

Greek citizens who sailed on a Gaza-bound flotilla are suing Israel's Navy. The more than 30 members of the A-Ship-To-Gaza organization, as well as the two firms that owned boats that took part in the May 31 flotilla to Gaza, are suing the Israeli naval commando unit Flotilla 13, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi and navy chief Eliezer Merom for the way the passengers were treated during and following their arrest in Israel after the flotilla's interception by Israel, which led to the deaths of nine Turkish passengers.

Canada steps up Iran sanctions

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada stepped up its sanctions regime against Iran last week by broadening its ban on materials, equipment and technology that might be used in the Islamic country's nuclear development program.

At the same time, the government updated a list of individuals subject to an asset freeze and travel ban, prohibited Canadians from making property or financial services available to Iran to aid its nuclear activities and barred the transfer of missile technology and other military systems to Iran.

Canada acted after the UN Security Council passed Resolution 1929 earlier this month, imposing a fourth round of sanctions on the Islamic Republic of Iran.

"The Iranian regime continues to violate its international obligations by ignoring successive UN Security Council resolutions to suspend its enrichment-related activities and refusing to co-operate fully with the International Atomic Energy Agency," said Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

"Today we have fulfilled our obligations to implement the decisions in UN Security Council Resolution 1929 and have amended our existing regulations to include these latest sanctions… These sanctions are designed to restrict Iran's nuclear program and are in no way intended to punish the Iranian people. Instead, these targeted measures are meant to send a strong signal to Iran that the international community expects Iran to meet its international obligations. They send a message to all states – particularly those with nuclear aspirations – that international standards cannot be flouted without consequences."

Referring in advance to last week's gathering of G8 nations, which Canada hosted, Harper said, "Canada will continue to use its G8 presidency to maintain international focus on Iran's nuclear program, and we stand ready to implement additional sanctions, as necessary, to promote regional and international peace and security."

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), a community advocacy group, applauded the measures, but called on the government to impose additional sanctions through the Special Economic Measures Act (SEMA). SEMA would give the government greater leeway to implement tougher sanctions without specific legislative authority, said CIC CEO Shimon Fogel.

"I think it's pretty realistic to anticipate that Iran will balk at complying with its international obligations and that Canada will invoke a further wave of economic penalties. We believe that the most effective approach that the government can take is by invoking SEMA," he said.

In Washington, the Comprehensive Iran Sanctions, Accountability and Divestment Act of 2010 cleared a congressional hurdle with passage through the House-Senate conference committee stage.

"We appreciate that House and Senate leaders have come together with a strong bill that builds upon the recently passed UN Security Council resolution, grants the president new authority and strengthens a multilateral strategy to isolate and pressure Iran," said a statement released by the office of the White House press secretary.

A week earlier, European Union lawmakers passed their own round of sanctions that target assets owned by Iran's Revolutionary Guard Corps, as well as companies investing in or transferring technology to Iranian oil and gas companies, the BBC reported.

In Ottawa, meanwhile, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler announced that "some 100 leading scholars, jurists, former government leaders, parliamentarians and Iranian activists have endorsed a 175-page international report" that accuses Iran of being a "clear and present danger to international peace and security." The report recommends a series of steps that could be taken by the international community, including the G8 and G20, "to combat and prevent the Iranian threat."

Cotler, a former federal justice minister, released the report on behalf of the Responsibility to Prevent Coalition on the one-year anniversary of the murder of Neda Agha-Soltan, a young woman killed during protests against the Iranian regime who became an iconic figure of defiance to the Iranian regime.

'We are encouraged by the support'

The march is not expected to persuade the government to offer a more generous proposal to Hamas, but it did dent the government's unified stance with the announcements by cabinet ministers Eli Yishai and Yaakov Margi of Shas and Michael Eitan of Likud that they intended to join the protest march organized by the family.

On Monday, meanwhile, Noam Schalit said his family is grateful and heartened by the support they have received thus far.

"We are encouraged by the support we are receiving, which was surprising to us, even yesterday," he said.

Schalit also responded to reports that several ministers were planning to join the protest march: "We are happy to be joined by any minister, but this needs to be backed up by results. We are aware of the 'price' and that terrorists will be freed, but we expect results after four years."

In Damascus, Hamas political bureau leader Khaled Meshal warned Israel that the longer it waits to accept a deal for Schalit's release, the greater his group's demands will grow.

"I told the Zionist leadership, who reneged on the prisoner swap and surrendered to American demands, that our demands for Gilad Schalit's release are clear, and as time goes by, we will raise the bar on our demands," Meshal told students in the Syrian capital.

"We will not settle for Schalit and, God willing, the freedom fighters will succeed in kidnapping more soldiers, as Israel doesn't understand anything but the language of force," Meshal added.

He also referred to Israel's May 31 raid on the Turkish aid ship to Gaza, and said that Israel's status in the world is declining.

"Israel is in a difficult situation and it has internalized the degree of [Hamas'] success after the Gaza flotilla and is now trying to divert the world's attention from the suffering of millions of Palestinians to the Schalit affair," Meshal said.

He reiterated that "Israel is an illegitimate Zionist entity," and criticized the leaders of Arab nations for continuing to have diplomatic ties with Israel.

In other developments, Hamas released its second animated video featuring Schalit.

The clip depicts the cross-border raid in which Schalit was abducted, with a tank shown exploding and transforming into a hand that grasps an Israeli soldier. It ends with a sentence in Arabic reading: "The illusion is shattering" and the date of Schalit's abduction.

Hamas has refused requests by the Red Cross and Human Rights Watch (HRW) to visit the captive soldier, saying to do so could reveal to Israel where he was being held. Hamas spokesperson Yehia Moussa told a Hamas newspaper the Red Cross did not take Middle East military reality into account when it made the request.

Nevertheless, HRW released a statement saying, "The laws of war prohibit cruel and inhuman treatment of persons in custody. They also require a party to a conflict to permit persons deprived of their liberty to correspond with their families and not to refuse arbitrarily a request by the ICRC to visit detainees."

Hamas has refused requests by the Red Cross to visit captive soldier

Pierre Dorbes, deputy head of the ICRC for Israel and the occupied territories said, "One of our main achievements is that we have been able to visit nearly everyone detained in connection to this conflict, with the exception of Gilad Schalit."

In Ottawa, Shimon Fogel, chief executive officer of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), said the Canadian Red Cross, an affiliate of the ICRC, as well as the Canadian government, have been asked to press the case for a humanitarian visit to Schalit.

"In the case of the Red Cross, a number of our interventions dealt with specific discussions of his situation and interventions by the ICRC under the Geneva Convention. Canada has called on Hamas to adhere to the Geneva Convention [regarding prisoner visits]," Fogel said.

"A Canadian voice generates more moral authority and international pressure to get [Hamas] to comply with their international obligations," he said.

In Rome, the Colosseum went dark to draw attention to Schalit's plight. The floodlights were also turned off at the Castello Sforzesco in Milan and the Mole Antonelliano in Turin. At the same time, floodlights illuminating Jerusalem's Old City wall were turned off in solidarity with Schalit. Schalit, who holds dual French-Israeli citizenship, was made an honorary citizen of Italy last year.

In New York, a flotilla of ships called the True Freedom Flotilla sailed from Pier 40 near the Statue of Liberty past the UN headquarters.

In London, Britain's foreign secretary, William Hague, called for Schalit's immediate and unconditional release and for ICRC access to him, while in Paris, about 10,000 people attended a rally last week to mark the fourth anniversary of his abduction.

Organized by CRIF, the umbrella organization of French Jews, the rally's speakers condemned Hamas and urged the release of Schalit.

Paris Deputy Mayor Anne Hidalgo said city council has decided to grant Schalit honorary citizenship of the city. "This is a symbolic act that will raise awareness and bring results on the ground," she said.

Participating in the rally were representatives of France's black citizen federation, Armenian friends of Israel and about 500 pro-Israel Christians.

Israel's pavilion at Shanghai World Expo is a hit

By ROB WALKER
Special to The CJN

SHANGHAI — For the first time in its history, Israel has built its own pavilion at the World Expo, which is being held in Shanghai, China, until Oct. 31 this year.

Israel's small building, close to the towering red Chinese pavilion, is shaped like a seashell. The exterior is half glass, half stone, with the two sides appearing to embrace each other.

Jackie Eldan, Israel's consul general in Shanghai, said the design is meant to be a handshake, with the stone representing the past, Israel's ancient and desert history, and the glass representing the bright, clear future.

"It is a dialogue between our being an ancient people, an innovative one also," he said. "It's a dialogue between our past and future."

Eldan said the pavilion was especially designed and targeted to Chinese visitors, and the expo's theme of "better city, better life." He added that the pavilion is meant to promote Israeli-Chinese commerce, as well as promoting Israel to the general Chinese population.

The two-storey pavilion is made up of three main parts. The Whispering Garden is an outdoor orchard with speakers whispering in both English and Mandarin, and the Hall of Light is a light-filled hallway showcasing Israel's landscape, history and achievements. The Hall of Light includes an original manuscript of the theory of relativity, written by Albert Einstein. The Hall of Innovations is a large auditorium featuring a short audiovisual presentation of Israel's technological innovations, including computer processors and the PillCam, a tiny camera that's ingested and allows doctors to examine a patient's digestive tract.

Eldan said that since the expo opened on May 1, the pavilion has welcomed about 3.5 million visitors, well above the two million expected. Most of the visitors have been Chinese. For the majority of them, the pavilion has been the first point of contact ever with Israelis or Jews, and so far, they've been impressed, he said.

"Einstein's original notes have been a big hit," Eldan added. "Many people are going crazy over them."

The pavilion's tour guides include local officials from Israel's Shanghai consulate and Mandarin-speaking Israelis.

Dikla Negbi Fisher, an Israeli who studied Mandarin at Hebrew University of Jerusalem, is one of the guides. She said Chinese tourists are fascinated by Israel, but their limited contact with Israel often means they're just trying to learn the basics.

"Often they ask me – 'are all Jews Israelis, or are all Israelis Jews,'" she said. "But they're very interested in Israel and Jews. They want to know more."

Eldan said while it's difficult to measure Israel's success at Expo 2010 Shanghai, one tool that will be used is simply to measure any increase in Israeli-Chinese trade in the coming years and try to determine whether the pavilion in Shanghai played a role. But no matter what the statistics eventually show, Eldan said the pavilion has already been a success.

"This project was very much attuned to Chinese eyes, and it has been a big hit. It's our pride and joy."

Israel spent about $6 million on the 2010 expo, including the cost of the pavilion and other related activities, according to the Israeli ministry of foreign affairs.

Jewish dancers attacked in Germany

JTA

BERLIN — Following an attack on dancers at a Jewish festival, Jewish leaders say they are worried about a possible upsurge in anti-Semitism among Muslim youth.

A group reportedly consisting mostly of children and teens of immigrant backgrounds threw stones at the Chaverim dancers from the Hanover Liberal congregation on June 19 and shouted, "Jews out!" One dancer was slightly injured. The performance was cancelled.

The stone throwers were mostly of Lebanese, Palestinian and Iranian origin, the Welt Online daily reported. Police have identified six suspects in the attack, five Arab immigrants and one German.

The city of Hanover has filed charges of slander and intent to cause grave physical harm. Reportedly it was the first violent anti-Semitic incident this year in the greater Hanover area that was not committed by neo-Nazis.

TRAVEL TALK

CHINA THROUGH JEWISH EYES DEPARTING IN OCTOBER

Toronto travel professional Harriet Morton is offering her two-week tour "China – A Journey Through Jewish Eyes" again this fall, with travel scheduled for Oct. 20 through Nov. 3, with an optional six-day extension in Guilin and Hong Kong.

The tour takes in Beijing, Harbin, Zhengzhou, Kaifeng, Xian and Shanghai. The focus, Morton says, is on "the little known panorama of Jewish history winding through China's long history, dating as far back as the 11th century and continuing to the present."

In Beijing, the group shares a Sabbath service and meal with the Kehillat Beijing Congregation and visits the Great Wall, Tiananmen Square and the Forbidden City. In Harbin, participants learn of the thriving Russian-Jewish community of the early 1900s; in Kaifeng they visit sites related to the city's ancient Jewish community; and in Xian they take in the Terra Cotta Warriors guarding the tombs of the first emperor. The journey continues to Shanghai, where more than 18,000 Jews found a haven during the Holocaust era.

Archeological Find at Tel Qashish: The Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) discovered more than 100 ancient religious artifacts in June during excavations in a natural hollow in the bedrock at Tel Qashish near Yokneam in northern Israel.

One of the cultic artifacts found at Tel Qashish

The items, which are about 3,500 years old, include a vessel for burning incense, a sculpted face of a woman broken away from a cup, goblets, bowls and tableware. It is believed that some of the artifacts came from Mycenae, supporting evidence of the ancient trade relations with Greece.

"In this period, before the Bible, the children of Israel were still in Egypt or the desert, and it would appear that the vessels were used in a pagan cult that worshipped idols," said the IAA's Dr. Edwin van den Brink. "During this period, it was customary that each city had a temple of its own where special religious vessels were used."

The IAA is planning a special exhibition of these artifacts to mark its 20th anniversary later this year.

Fringe comedy portrays Adam and Eve post-exile

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

The annual Toronto Fringe Festival is underway, and this year it's staging a slew of shows – about 150 altogether.

The festival, which runs to July 11, showcases productions picked through a lottery system, so they are not judged before they run.

The Bible-inspired comedy Eve's Garden tells a story of Adam and Eve post-exile from the Garden of Eden. But the characters have taken on their own form, said writer Dorothy Lichtblau.

"The characters are not what you would find in Genesis, but some of the themes may have risen from that story," she said. "It's the way Eve is understood in relationship to Adam, but she's different from the Eve we encounter in Genesis."

During the play, Eve is determined to get back into Eden because she feels unjustly banished, Lichtblau said.

"It's a response to that story, and it's thinking about other possibilities in terms of interpretation of scenes of who Adam and Eve were," she said.

Razia Israely

This is Lichtblau's fourth Fringe Festival production, beginning with her first one in 1992, called Gesundheit. The idea for Eve's Garden came to her in the 1990s, when she was taking a writing workshop given by the late Canadian writer Libby Scheier.

"The original monologue for the story came to me and it really didn't let me go," Lichtblau said, adding that she has written a few versions of this story. The version for this festival examines whether the exile from the garden was an act of free will or part of a grand design.

She enjoys learning about Torah and imparting the wisdom and stories into contemporary times and modern life, she said, having studied bibliodrama through the Institute for Contemporary Midrash.

Lichtblau's stories tend to emphasize Jewish women's issues.

"I started because I saw a need in the community in terms of having a sense of women's voices and lives, and talking about inclusivity in the community and bringing traditions forward into contemporary times," she said.

"At its core, Eve's Garden is a love story that addresses the impossibility of absolute truth and knowledge," she said.

Eve's Garden is at the St. Vladimir's Institute at 620 Spadina Ave.

Razia Israely shares the story of a woman's relationship with her Holocaust survivor father in her one-woman show, The Dentist.

Israely came up with the story idea after reading We Wept Without Tears by Gideon Greif, a book featuring interviews with sonderkomando men – Holocaust victims who were forced to aid Nazis in the concentration camps.

Inspired by the book, Israely, an Israeli, interviewed the daughters of some of these men, who told her stories about their fathers and their childhoods.

The Dentist is largely based on the stories of one particular daughter who, at 50 years old, reflects on her father's history, Israely said.

The character in the show is named Rosi after Israely's grandmother, who's also a Holocaust survivor.

In the true story, the daughter learned the details of her father's involvement in the concentration camps only when the book was released 10 years after his death.

"She didn't forgive herself," Israely said. "She didn't know what he did in the crematorium. She only knew he had a number, and she knew something happened to him because of the way he behaved."

Israely described him as having become very nervous after the war, and doing "cruel things to his children," hence the daughter's wish to remain anonymous.

Israely said she has been performing a Hebrew version of this show regularly in Israel since 2006, and usually stays an extra hour afterward to answer questions.

She staged the English version of The Dentist at the Edinburgh Festival Fringe in 2009. Although she couldn't stay to answer questions, people waited to greet her after the show.

"The people waited with tears, and sometimes they can't talk," she said.

During her performance, Israely uses her voice and acting skills to create Rosi and the characters in the play.

"They're alive. You can see them, you can feel them," she said, adding that the story is a really special one. "I want to do it everywhere to tell this story."

The Toronto Fringe Festival brings Israely to perform in Canada for the first time ever. The Dentist plays at the Helen Gardiner Phelan Playhouse at 79A St. George Street.

The Seven of Us is a musical that began life as an 18-minute medley for creator Brian Goldenberg's high school project 11 years ago.

It has grown significantly since then. It was performed as a workshop at the Vaughan City Playhouse to get feedback and develop it further. Then, in 2004, it ran at the Markham Youth Theatre. Now, it's a part of Toronto's largest theatre festival.

The Seven of Us tells the story of seven friends graduating from university, learning about life and their relationships with one another.

[Jeff Goldenberg photo]

"I think it's very universal," Goldenberg said. "I think a lot of people can relate to the characters."

Rob, the main character, is expected to enter the family business, but he's not so sure that's what he wants to do, Goldenberg said.

The characters learn many lessons, including that relationships change, and some things that worked four or five years ago might not necessarily work now, he said.

The characters are multi-dimensional with real problems that people can relate to, Goldenberg said, as he used material from that real life to build the characters.

"There's a little bit of me and people that I know or I've grown up with that are embedded in who each of the characters are," he said. "There's a lot of truth in the characters, but the story is truly fictional."

Although he had to cut some scenes to make the production fit into the 90-minute limit for Fringe shows, he said the show doesn't suffer.

The Seven of Us is at the Bathurst Street Theatre, 736 Bathurst St.

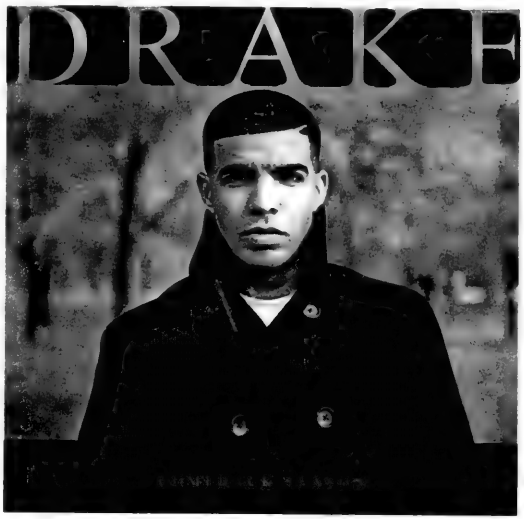
Drake makes a name on the hip-hop scene

By DANIELLE BERRIN
JTA



LOS ANGELES — In a culture of misfits and outsiders, Aubrey (Drake) Graham is the ultimate outsider – a big-time black Jewish rapper.

His star is rising rapidly on the hip-hop scene.

Though fans have followed the Jewish-Canadian Drake since his days as basketball star Jimmy Brooks on the Canadian teen-drama TV series Degrassi: The Next Generation, a recent spate of press has introduced the 23-year-old artist to the broader public. The New York Times declared the young, emotionally vulnerable artist "the most important and innovative new figure in hip hop."

Drake released his first album, Thank Me Later, earlier this month, though his mixtapes have been widely circulating since 2006. In fact, Drake earned the unusual distinction of being nominated for a 2010 Grammy without the release of an album.

He's been travelling in the right company: Rap star Lil Wayne was the first mainstream act to incorporate Drake into his touring routine and served as somewhat of a mentor to the fledgling artist.

Drake was born to an African-American father and a Jewish mother who divorced when he was five, according to an interview in Heeb magazine, and he was raised by his mother in Forest Hill, a heavily Jewish neighbourhood of Toronto. He attended a Jewish day school and had a bar mitzvah, which featured the Backstreet Boys tune "I Want It That Way."

His father was primarily absent and, according to the Times, struggled with drug addiction and spent time in prison. His mother suffered from rheumatoid arthritis, which prevented her from working and forced Drake to grow up fast. In interviews he often portrays himself as a loner.

"I went to a Jewish school where nobody understood what it was like to be black and Jewish," he told Heeb. "When kids are young, it's hard for them to understand the makeup of religion and race."

Drake told the magazine that he was often called a schvartze, a derogatory term for blacks.

"But the same kids that made fun of me are super proud [of me] now," he said. "And they act as if nothing happened."

Drake displays signs of Jewish pride. Heeb says he wears a diamond-studded chai. He also wants to travel to Israel, the magazine reports.

With his complex identity, Drake is using the internalized experience of his childhood to infuse hip hop with a rare emotionality. The Times gave his album an encouraging review, calling it "moody, entrancing and emotionally articulate," and adding that he "manages to balance vulnerability and arrogance in equal measure."

After struggling through childhood, Drake seems to be enjoying the current payoff – the Heeb interview chronicles him driving around Manhattan in a Bentley. Already, however, there have been reports of overspending and financial mismanagement.

Even so, with his career ascending, Drake doesn't seem to be worried about finances. He told the Times that he's more concerned about the insularity caused by fame.

"Did I sacrifice something?" he wondered. "Have I not realized what it is yet because I'm enjoying this too much?"

The U.S. role in the Mideast

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Waging a counter-insurgency campaign in Iraq, fighting a war in Afghanistan, attempting to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict and striving to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions, the United States, the pre-eminent world power, has its work cut out in the Middle East.

Two books published recently analyze Washington's role in a turbulent region flush with oil and gas.

In A World of Trouble: The White House and the Middle East From the Cold War to the War on Terror (HarperCollins), Patrick Tyler examines how 10 U.S. presidents since the 1940s have engaged or confronted the Mideast and its leaders.

Tyler, a former foreign correspondent of the Washington Post and the New York Times, has written an accessible book that both laymen and specialists will likely appreciate.

Like the best of journalists, Tyler has a knack for blending first-class reportage with lucid writing.

The second book under review, A Choice of Enemies: America Confronts the Middle East (Doubleday), is by Lawrence Freedman, a historian at King's College in London.

Though more academic in tone, it also analyzes the role that American presidents have played in the Middle East. Freedman's focus, however, is on five presidents from Jimmy Carter onward.

Since the topic at hand is so immense, the authors have been given free rein in terms of space. Tyler's book weighs in at 628 pages, counting footnotes and an index, while Freedman's tome is 601 pages long.

Readers, therefore, should be prepared for a long but useful slog.

In a bracing observation, Tyler reminds us that while the Middle East for much of the last century was not a crucial area for the United States, it assumed a new importance after Israel's declaration of independence, the rise of Arab nationalism and the advent of oil politics and Islamic radicalism.

But he points out that the security of the United States and the West has eroded in the face of intensifying "enmities and grievances" emanating from the the Middle East.

Tyler, in his panoramic survey, ranges far and wide.

Harkening back to the 1950s, he recreates the tense atmosphere that prevailed as Israel tried to drive a wedge between the Eisenhower administration and Gamal Abdel Nasser, the charismatic president of Egypt, and as the United States forced Israel to withdraw from the Sinai Peninsula after the Sinai War.

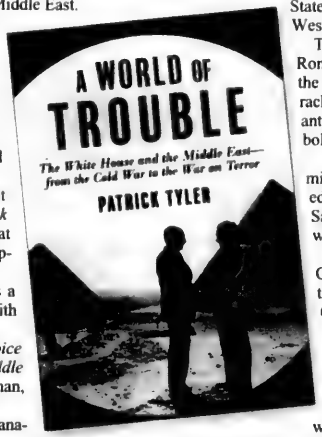
In addition, Tyler wades knee-deep into the debate that erupted in John F. Kennedy's administration after Israel acquired a French nuclear reactor.

He retraces Lyndon Johnson's futile efforts to avert the Six Day War, claiming that Johnson was remiss in not demanding an Israeli withdrawal from the territories.

In his judgment, Richard Nixon's presidency marked the United States' "full entry" into the Middle East by virtue of the fact that it armed Israel and Iran as major regional powers.

Saying that Washington's friendship with Israel underwent a sea change after the Yom Kipper War, he writes,"The Jewish state had gone from being a tiny and troublesome power in the Middle East that the United States kept at arm's length... to become a regional powerhouse equipped with American tanks and warplanes, and its own nuclear weapons."

The 1973 war inaugurated a new era in U.S. diplomacy in the Middle East. Jimmy Carter wanted to capitalize on this situation by convening a peace summit under the auspices of the United States and the Soviet Union.



Anwar Sadat, the visionary president of Egypt, sidelined the plan by forging a dramatic rapprochement with Israel.

Tyler's explanation of Carter's interest in resolving the Palestinian problem is rooted in U.S. domestic politics. Though the comparison may not have been exact, Carter saw "a rough symmetry" between racial injustice in the United States and Israel's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Tyler believes, not without merit, that Ronald Reagan's failure to retaliate for the bombing of the U.S. Marines barrack in Beirut probably emboldened anti-American elements such as Hezbollah, Syria and Iran.

He suggests that the Reagan administration held its nose as it courted the serial human rights violator, Saddam Hussein, during Iraq's war with Iran.

In a revelation regarding the 1991 Gulf War, Tyler reports that the then-U.S. secretary of defence, Dick Cheney, urged his boss, George Bush, to allow Israel to join the anti-Iraqi military coalition. While demurring, Bush offered Israel a compromise. It could fire ballistic missiles at Iraqi air bases. Israel was not interested, being convinced that such attacks would be of no value.

Tyler's observations on Bill Clinton's attempts to persuade Israel and Syria to sign a peace treaty are fascinating.

He argues that the 1998 Wye summit represented the final breakdown in trust between Clinton and Benjamin Netanyahu, the Israeli prime minister.

Tyler has a dim view of Ehud Barak, Netanyahu's successor. He describes Barak as arrogant, secretive and dismissive of different opinions.

Patrick Tyler

Although Tyler rates the United States' invasion of Iraq as "a model of military efficiency," he comes down hard on Washington's poor postwar planning.

Freedman has little good to say about the United States' involvement in the Middle East.

Its presence in Iraq is unpopular at home. Its dispute with Iran remains unsolved. Its effort to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict has borne no fruit. Its war in Afghanistan, while having dislodged the Taliban from power and denying Al Qaeda a base, has generated further instability and embroiled neighbouring Pakistan in increasing chaos.

Covering a lot of ground in this erudite volume, Freedman segues from one subject to the next in seamless fashion.

He assesses the fall of Iran's monarchy as a devastating blow to U.S. interests. He discusses Washington's pro-Iraqi tilt in the 1980s. He offers a decent analysis of the Camp David summit in 2000 and of the breakdown of the Oslo peace process. Like Tyler, he is quite critical of Barak. He explains the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising.

In conclusion, Freedman says that the United States no longer enjoys the prestige and influence it enjoyed in the Middle East in the early 1990s.

Nonetheless, Washington will continue to dominate a region whose instability affects almost everyone on this globe.

Israeli developer leaves his mark on Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli Canadian real estate developer Gil Blutrich and his partners are transforming Toronto's first luxury hotel, the King Edward.

Popularly known as the King Eddy, but recently rebranded as the Le Meridien King Edward, the 298-room landmark sits on the edge of the financial district.

Built in 1903 by Toronto's wealthiest citizen, George Gooderham, it was named after Britain's King Edward VII.

Blutrich, a 44-year-old sabra who has lived in Canada since 1998, bought the hotel from a Manhattan investment bank for $48 million and closed the deal a few months ago.

The president and chief executive officer of Skyline International Development and Mishorim Development Group Ltd., he purchased the historic property with Dundee Realty, the Serruya Realty Group and Russian-born businessman Alex Shnaider.

They plan to sink about $30 million into renovations, of which an estimated $8 million will be used to refurbish the cavernous and once glamorous Crystal Ballroom on the penthouse level.

There will be 10,000 square feet of space for shops on the ground floor.

According to plan, the hotel will remain under the management of Starwood Hotels & Resorts.

The investors intend to build approximately 140 condominiums on the currently vacant third, fourth and fifth floors. Ranging in price from $400,000 to $800,000, the condos will be ready for occupancy around the end of 2011.

Blutrich said he acquired the hotel for two reasons.

First, the price was right – considerably less than what it originally cost the American bank.

Second, he wanted to preserve it. "So many architectural gems in Toronto have disappeared," said Blutrich, a history buff who has spent days in the municipal archive poring over old photographs of Toronto, many of which show the King Edward Hotel in its prime.

"A nation can't build a strong future by forgetting its past."

Several years ago, in this spirit, Blutrich purchased Port McNicoll, a depressed hamlet near Midland, Ont., where the Canadian Pacific Railway established a thriving port for its Great Lakes passenger and cargo fleets.

Shut down in the mid-1960s, the port had lost its lustre. In a bid to develop the waterfront area into an eclectic recreational destination, Blutrich bought the nearby Horseshoe Valley ski complex two years ago, hoping to integrate both places into a year-round ski, golf, fishing and boating resort.

"This project will take at least a decade to complete," he said.

As he sees it, the $1.6-billion project will have a significant economic impact on the region, creating hundreds of jobs at the very least.

"It will generate employment equivalent to three automobile plants," he claimed.

Blutrich also owns two downtown boutique hotels, the Cosmopolitan and the Pantages, as well as about one million square feet of space in commercial and apartment buildings in the province.

In Israel, he is the controlling shareholder in Mishorim Development Group Ltd., a public company with a portfolio of office buildings in Tel Aviv, Netanya, Petach Tikva and Ashdod.

Although he no longer maintains a residence in Israel, Blutrich, now a Canadian citizen, goes to Israel four times a year to monitor his Israeli holdings.

The son of a retired naval officer and kindergarten teacher whose Austrian and Polish ancestors arrived in Palestine in the 1930s, Blutrich hails from the coastal plain town of Ranana, a middle-class bedroom suburb of Tel Aviv.

After completing three years of service in the Israeli Air Force in the 1980s, he studied hotel management at a school in Herzliya.

"I like the hospitality business," he said. "I thought it would be a good way to tour the world. My hope was to become the general manager of a hotel."

At the suggestion of his wife after he graduated, he embarked on a far different path, becoming a real estate broker.

Having cut his teeth as a partner in a real estate firm, he began buying properties. In 1989, he founded Mishorim. Today, he owns 73 per cent of its shares.

Although he has been compared to American real estate mogul Donald Trump in terms of acumen and accomplishments, Blutrich rejects the comparison. "I'm low key, a family man," he said, a smile creasing his youthful face.

Gil Blutrich

He attributes his success to a number of variables, including hard work.

Blutrich starts his day at around 6 a.m., initially tending to his interests in Israel by way of his trusty BlackBerry.

He is usually the first person to arrive and the last one to leave his office. He is driven by ambition and says he can think "out of the box." And he really likes what he does.

Essentially, Blutrich came to Canada to expand his business. "I didn't want to put all my eggs in one basket," he explained. "Conditions in the Canadian real estate market looked good. Canada is really a land of opportunity."

As he tells it, he came here not with the intention of staying permanently, but with the idea of remaining only for a while. But the longer he lived in Toronto, the more he liked it.

"I fell in love with Canada. I like its pluralism and multiculturalism."

As an Israeli, he has no compunction about having emigrated. "I don't feel guilty."

Despite his decision to leave Israel, Blutrich is still very much of an Israeli.

He was involved in the formation of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, and he's active in the Israel Forum, a local organization that tries to build bridges of understanding between Israeli immigrants and the established Jewish community.

He played a pivotal role in the creation of the Israeli-centred, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto-connected Kachol Lavan supplementary school.

In addition, Blutrich was the founder of Doing Business, an Israeli non-governmental organization that teaches entrepreneurial skills to troubled youths so that they can contribute positively to society. Designed for Jewish and Arab teens between the ages of 16 and 18, the 15-year program has spread to 42 municipalities and pulls in about 600 teenagers per year.

Closer to home, Blutrich continues to support Ve'ahavta, a Jewish non-profit organization that helps the poor and homeless in Toronto.

Toronto youths support sports facility in Haifa

Compiled by CJN Staff

Haifa's Neve Yossef Soccer Club was the beneficiary of a fund raising tournament that saw hundeds of hoop enthusiasts compete. Open division champs, from left, Matt Zio, Tunny Warner and Zak Maresky show off their trophies while in picture at right, event organizers, from left, Matt Klar, Justin Hummel, Cory Capland and Sammy Pasternak join guest Tamir Goodman, centre, who has dedicated his post-basketball career to helping underprivileged youths in Haifa.

Hundreds of basketball players competing in high school and university (open) divisions traded shots recently in a fundraiser for the Neve Yossef Soccer Club in Haifa.

The event, which took place at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan, raised $13,000 for the project, which will repair a rundown building that provides sporting facilities to underprivileged youths.

Former professional basketball player Tamir Goodman – who has dedicated his career to helping underprivileged kids in Haifa – came from Cleveland to attend the event. Addressing the crowd, he described his experiences as the only Orthodox Jew ever to play professional basketball.

Also on the agenda was a dunk show by world-renowned dunker and YouTube sensation Justin "Jus Fly" Darlington. Darlington amazed the crowd with some spectacular dunks, including one in which he jumped over Goodman. The show was hosted by Q-Mack and featured Canada's No. 1 beatboxer, Scott Jackson.

Winning the high school division was Team Cantor, which included Hayden Cantor, Josh Foreman and Sam Ramzani. The winning team from the open division was Team Maresky, consisting of Zak Maresky, Tunny Warner and Matt Zio.

The Neve Yossef Soccer Club could use the money. Though somewhat decrepit in appearance from the outside, it's a haven for underprivileged youth in Haifa.

Some 200 to 250 children and youths take part in sports activities at the club, most of them from poor families. Many are new immigrants to Israel. The volunteers who work at the club provide the children with a structured and supportive environment, which helps keep them off the street. Discipline, team work and responsibility are stressed, in addition to instruction in soccer skills.

The club's building requires major renovations, including a new roof and washroom. Laundry facilities also need to be updated.

That is where first-year Wilfrid Laurier University students Justin Hummel, Matt Klar, Sammy Ptasznik, and Cory Capland stepped in. They created the fundraising tournament after being inspired by a talk by Goodman last September at a Friday night dinner sponsored by Chabad Lubavitch of Waterloo Region.

Hummel, head of the organizing committee, said a lot of hard work went into the venture, beginning in the fall.

"It was our first year at university and we all lived together in the same residence. The idea came about at our first Shabbat away at school. We have always been fortunate in our lives, and sports have played an important part in our youth. We wanted to ensure that children in Israel would get the same opportunities we had," he said. "By the end of the week, we had come up with a proposal for the event, and my friends and I started planning the tournament and began to seek out donors."

With the assistance of the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation, a non-profit group whose mission is to advance educational, cultural, community and environmental projects in Haifa, they got to work.

"In contributing to the Neve Yossef Club, as well as the Haifa Hoops for Kids organization, we are achieving the same goal of helping out children in need in Haifa through sports," Hummel said.

Lisa Plant, executive director of the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation, said that the "efforts of this group towards the Neve Yossef Club in Haifa will result in an ongoing permanent structure that will provide a true haven for these kids, not only today, but for those that follow in the years to come. They have accomplished a true mitzvah."

The Neve Yossef Project is estimated to cost $23,800. With the money raised at the tournament, the project is still $9,200 short of its goal.

For more information, contact Plant at lisa.haifafoundation@gmail.com or 647-4307743, or Hummel at justinhummel@gmail.com.

Jewish businessman acquires Henderson jersey

Compiled by CJN staff

Toronto businessman Mitchell Goldhar scored the winning bid in an auction to acquire Paul Henderson's famed No. 19 jersey he wore while scoring the winning goal for Canada against the Soviet Union in the 1972 Summit Series in Moscow.

Goldhar, the owner of SmartCentres, a real estate development company, won with a bid of just over $1 million (US). With auction fees included, he'll pay $1.275 million (US) for the sweater.

Goldhar, who purchased the Maccabi Tel Aviv soccer club last year, told the Toronto Star he considered himself "custodian" of the jersey and planned to take it on a cross-country tour so that Canadians can connect with a momentous national event. Eventually, the jersey will have lengthy stays in the Canadian Sports Hall of Fame and the Hockey Hall of Fame, he said.

Maybe I need a change

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

It's evening. I'm lying in bed looking at the ceiling while Meir's standing and ironing next to me. It's peaceful. All we hear is the calming sound of the moving iron. I decide to drop the bomb.

"Meir, we need to talk. I don't want you to panic or come to imprudent conclusions, but I'm fed up with my life as it is. It's not like I'm planning on killing myself," I add quickly, "but I can't take it anymore."

There, I said it.

Meir looks at me silently, and puts the iron on its stand. "Nina," he says softly, "we need to buy the teacher a present."

"Didn't we buy her one already?" I ask.

"No. Remember at the end-of-school-year party? We brought presents to all of the teachers, the school secretaries and the janitors, but we forgot to buy the art teacher a present. She gave me her address. We'll send it to her."

I get furious. "Haven't you heard a word I said?" I shout. "I'm standing on a verge of an abyss here! I'm tired of doing what I'm doing! I'm tired of being nice to people, of smiling, of waking up in the morning, of you!"

Meir irons silently. He has this gaze – his eyes say: the teacher's present.

We say nothing for a while.

"How about an art book?" he suggests, finally.

"She must have dozens of them." I say. "Yesterday, as I was riding my bike, I realized I should change my life completely. I even considered leaving you." I say bravely.

Meir stops ironing at once. "Earrings!" he cries. "We'll get her earrings."

"What kind of earrings?"

"Maybe antique earrings," he says.

"Maybe," I say, and continue. "So, next time I'll ride my bike with my lover, we'll stop and have passionate, even illegal in some states, sex, right there, on the cycle path!"

No response.

"Did you hear me?" I cry.

"Sure. 'Right on the psychopath,'" he quotes calmly.

"Cycle path! Not psychopath!" I shout.

He looks at me and starts ironing my white trousers. "Of course, not everybody likes antiques," he sighs finally.

"But," I say, "she's an art teacher. I think there's a good chance she'd like it."

He somehow does not look persuaded.

"Don't art people like contemporary arts? I think I'll go now, wake the kids, pack us some suitcases and leave you right now! Are you listening?"

He nods softly. "'And leave you right now,'" he echoes.

"Maybe a necklace. Somehow earrings seem too personal," he says pensively.

"What colour?"

"How about turquoise?" he suggests.

"Sounds good," I agree. "I know what you're gonna say," I continue. "You'll say I should spice up my life, is all. Next thing you'll say I should spice my life with arsenic! Gosh you must really hate me, Meir! Why won't you just admit it? Why won't you just stab a knife in my trachea, and get it over with?"

Meir folds my flowery shirt quietly. "I think an art book, after all," he whispers.

"Yeah," I agree. "Less personal. Plus she'd be able to exchange it."

We smile hesitantly at each other. He folds the ironing board and comes to lie at my side in the bed. "I'm glad we had this talk," he says, as I snuggle in his arms.

"Yes, I needed to get it all out of my system." I say.

"Still, I think you should stop this no-carbs diet," he concludes.

Boy, is he right!

Tai chi can improve overall wellness

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

We've all seen the small groups of men and women in the park moving in unison as if they're rehearsing dance moves.

These slow, graceful, seemingly effortless movements are actually an exercise called tai chi, an ancient form of martial arts that's been practised in China for thousands of years.

Tai chi is a series of natural physical movements, breathing and mental concentration. Most people practise tai chi today for its incredible health and wellness benefits. Tai chi is known to increase strength and flexibility, promote relaxation, improve sleep, and reduce pain and joint stiffness.

It also increases both balance and leg strength, because often the movements involve shifting weight from one leg to the other. Tai chi improves posture by strengthening the core muscles and helps reduce depression and anxiety by focusing the mind on proper breathing. Tai chi (and Qigong, a form of tai chi) is fast becoming very popular in Canada, because it's a whole-body, low-impact, weight-bearing, gentle, relaxing workout that anyone can do, regardless of age or fitness level.

Tai chi increases the flow of energy through the body, leading to a feeling of overall well-being. When practising tai chi, your mind stays still, and you feel relaxed and more aware of your own body's movements. Through slow, gentle movements, you're aligning your body in order to enhance the flow of energy.

A recent study by the George Institute found that participating in tai chi regularly reduced pain and increased mobility in chronic arthritis sufferers. The Oregon Research Institute found that seniors who engaged in tai chi twice a week for an hour had no trouble performing activities such as walking, climbing, bending, lifting, eating, and dressing compared with their peers who did not participate in the classes. Tai chi is usually taught in groups at parks or community centres and is a great way to get and stay healthy, whether you're a beginner or fitness expert.

Noah, the dove and waffles

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Every Sunday, Noah, my son, and I eat waffles and learn Torah. We are studying Parshat Noach, the story of Noah and the ark. Within the words of this story we discovered a profound relationship between a man and a bird.

Once the rain had subsided, Noah, the builder of the ark, dispatched a raven to determine if dry land was close by, but the raven returned empty-beaked. Subsequently, Noah, a "righteous man in his generation," sent out a dove, and the Torah says: "She returned unto him… and he put forth his hand and took her, and brought her in unto him, into the ark."

Recognizing that all the words in the Torah are important, look at this verse and see how it reflects a striking image of one of the only remaining people on Earth and his deep connection with the dove. The Torah says the dove "returned unto him," whereas the raven "went forth to and fro," suggesting it returned to the ark, but not to Noah.

Further, the wording, "he took her," implies that Noah actively reached for the dove and then "brought her in unto him," a metaphor of great affection.

The Torah continues: after seven days, Noah again sent out the dove – a bird that would languish and die in captivity – and "the dove came in to him at night, and in her mouth an olive-leaf, freshly plucked."

In the initial verse, Noah "brought her in unto him," and here, the bird "came in to him."

In this narrative we see a particular relationship, one that seems to symbolize a mutual appreciation and a loving dependency between the man, Noah, and the white, peaceful bird.

We also uncover a dimension of their connection that suggests a need to be apart. The dove returns with an olive branch, a bitter-tasting food she would not normally eat. Our rabbis teach us: "Better is bitter food that comes from God [or freedom] than the sweetest food at the hands of man."

In essence, the dove was telling Noah, "I cannot stay with you because I am a bird. While I love you and needed you, now I will fly freely and eat from the earth, even if I only discover an olive branch."

"O that I had wings like a dove, for then would I fly away and be at rest," – King David.

Near the parshah's conclusion, the relationship ends. The verse says: "And he [Noah] stayed yet another seven days and sent forth the dove, and she returned not again unto him any more."

The Torah does not say, "The dove did not return to the ark," as it did of the raven, but instead states that it did not come back to Noah and emphasizes the point through the words "any more" – a phrase required to demonstrate the finality of the flood and the importance of a new separation between humankind and animals.

This portion of the Torah illustrates the beginning and end of a comradeship between a man appointed by God to save the world and a bird – nature. Their bond was beautiful and predicated on Noah's understanding that only the dove could determine if the world was habitable again. It was also built on the dove's appreciation of Noah for saving her kind and all others.

While the dove may not have physically returned to Noah, like friends who decide to travel divergent ways, their lives were inextricably bound forever.

Pride and Prejudice

More than 500 pro-Israel supporters celebrated in the July 4 Toronto Pride Parade. They came to stand with Kulanu Toronto, the city's main Jewish Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgendered organization, as it countered the anti-Israel messages of the controversial group, Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA). Organizers of the parade had banned QuAIA from the event in May then reversed this decision mid-June. Please see related stories, pages 3 and 4.

Israeli-Palestinian soccer team plays in FIFA tournament

JTA

JOHANNESBURG — A combined Israeli-Palestinian soccer team is in South Africa to play on the sidelines of the World Cup soccer tournament.

The team of eight players are playing in the FIFA 2010 Football for Hope Festival that kicked off on Sunday.

The Israeli-Palestinian contingent is one of 32 teams of young people playing in what is being billed as a festival of education, culture and football. The youths are members of organizations in 82 countries that use football to tackle social issues such as homelessness and HIV/AIDS.

This official event of the 2010 FIFA World Cup South Africa, which ends on July 11, is organized by FIFA, streetfootballworld, the 2010 FIFA World Cup organizing committee in South Africa and the City of Johannesburg.

The team from Israel, known as the "Peace Team," is a diverse group: four girls and four boys, four Arab players and four Israeli players, one Arab coach and one Israeli coach.

Royal Ballet in Israel

WINNIPEG — The Royal Winnipeg Ballet (RWB) will perform in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Haifa in October for the first time since 1975. The RWB is partnering with the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, which has planned a mission to Israel to coincide with the troupe's performances. Manitoba Premier Greg Selinger and Opposition leader Hugh McFayden are expected to participate in the mission and to be in attendance when the ballet performs. Members of the ballet company are expected to join the mission for selected touring events.

Jazz Honours

NEW YORK — For the fourth year in a row, Israeli jazz musician Anat Cohen received the Clarinetist of the Year Award from the international Jazz Journalists Association. Cohen, who plays the clarinet as well as the tenor saxophone, is known for her versatile range. In 2007, the Tel Aviv native was the first woman and the first Israeli to headline the famed New York jazz club the Village Vanguard. She is scheduled to perform at the Newport Jazz Festival in August.

Son of Hamas

WASHINGTON — The United States has dropped deportation proceedings against Mosab Hassan Yousef, the son of a Hamas founder who served as a spy for Israel's Shin Bet security service. A convert to Christianity who has lived in the United States since 2007, Yousef will be granted asylum in the United States following a routine background check. Yousef's father, Hassan Yousef, is a founder of the Palestinian terrorist group.

Execution Demanded

SANAA, Yemen — Yemeni Jews demanded an end to the delay in the execution of Abdel Aziz Yahia al-Abdi, sentenced to death for killing a Jewish father of nine. About 20 Yemeni Jews protested outside the justice ministry, calling for enforcement of an appeals court ruling that sentenced Abdi to death for the murder of Masha Yaish Nahari. Abdi killed Nahari in December 2008 after saying Yemeni Jews should convert or be killed.

Investigation Urged

WASHINGTON — The Barack Obama administration is pressing Israel to conduct a "thorough, transparent and credible" investigation into the death of pro-Palestinian activist Rachel Corrie. The 23-year-old from Olympia, Wash., was trying to stop a bulldozer from demolishing a Palestinian home when she was killed seven years ago. An Israeli army investigation found the driver of the bulldozer could not see Corrie and did not intentionally run over her. "We continue to provide [the family] with support," said the State Department's P.J. Crowley.

Israeli Arab NGO Sues Canadian Funders

WASHINGTON — Mada al-Carmel, an Israeli Arab non-governmental organization, is suing the International Development Research Centre (IDRC), a Canadian government-affiliated body, for cutting off funding, saying it succumbed to pressure from Israel's government.

The IDRC says it cut off funding – $800,000, or 40 per cent of the group's income – because it funds only developing world initiatives, and Mada is in Israel, a developed country. IDRC had funded Mada's research into the status of women. Mada said IDRC succumbed to pressure from figures close to the government of Israel because of the group's criticism of Israel.

IDRC acknowledged it was alerted to Mada's status by NGO Monitor, a watchdog organization that reports on groups critical of Israel, but denied that NGO Monitor's complaints influenced its decision. IDRC is funded by the government but is constitutionally required to make independent decisions.

NGO Monitor's principle complaint with Mada was the group's association with a campaign against violence against women that linked such violence to Israeli polices.

500 march with Kulanu at Pride

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

To Paul Druzin, a former Israel Defence Forces soldier and a current member of Toronto's gay community, Toronto's Pride Parade is about more than just rainbow flags and drag queens.

"It's about gay rights. Or it used to be," said Druzin a few hours before walking with Kulanu Toronto, Toronto's Jewish lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender group, in the city's Pride Parade on Sunday.

Pride's vision has changed since its decision to allow the group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) to participate in the parade, Druzin said.

"As a gay person, I'm very offended that there's a hate group at Pride," he said, adding that, while legitimate criticism of a government shouldn't be censored, the phrase "Israeli apartheid" should.

This phrase, which is regarded as discriminatory by members of the Jewish community, was originally banned from the parade by Pride Toronto, which later reversed the ban.

"Pride did a flip-flop," said Martin Gladstone, a gay activist and lawyer who spearheaded the campaign to ban QuAIA. "But the facts didn't change. It's still a violation of the city's rules of discrimination."

Josephine Livak, 5, and her mother, Ann Komaromi, marched with Kulanu at the Pride Parade.
[Rita Poliakov photo]

While the city does have a non-discrimination policy, it cannot enforce this policy unless it's been violated by city workers or by a city-run event. The city has said that Pride must determine whether or not the phrase "Israeli apartheid" is discriminatory and that anyone with complaints about a non-city service must address the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal.

Giorgio Mammoliti, a city councillor who was expected to drop out of the mayoral race on Monday, tabled a motion in May asking that Pride have its more than $121,000 city funding pulled if it allowed QuAIA to participate.

The councillor said he would be tabling a similar motion again after Pride. This motion would ask for Pride's funding this year to go back to taxpayers and that the city discontinue its funding of Pride next year. Rob Ford, a city councillor and mayoral candidate, said he would support this motion.

Gladstone said the phrase "Israeli apartheid" doesn't belong at Pride.

"Pride is supposed to be a place of inclusion and tolerance. [QuAIA] has created a divisive, hateful environment," he said. "[Pride turned] from a celebration to a battleground."

Elle Flanders, a spokesperson for QuAIA, said on Sunday that the organization is not a hate group and is criticizing Israel's policies, not its right to exist.

No pride in this parade

From the editor's desk...

This column was written before the Toronto Pride Parade last weekend on July 4. The parade was intended by parade organizers to be a joyful commemoration of the 30th anniversary of the annual event.

But that commemoration was spoiled by the duplicity and dissembling of event organizers who reversed their decision to ban the use of a banner proclaiming "Israeli apartheid."

As readers of The CJN know through the numerous reports that we published on the subject over the past six weeks, Pride Parade organizers agreed to disallow a group known as Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) from marching with their signs and banners defaming the Jewish state as an apartheid state. It must be pointed out that the members of QuAIA were not disallowed from taking part in the Pride Parade. On the contrary, they were invited to participate. But they could do so only on condition that they set aside their calumnious, hateful signage.

In a June 3 article, Margaret Ngai, Pride's interim co-chair, told The CJN: "It's important to understand that Pride Toronto does not take a position on the conflict in the Middle East... We are obliged to respect and follow city policies in addition to legislations of all levels of government when considering freedom of expression... We hope that, over time, there will be a way for people to use language that can promote education and knowledge over anger and hatred. This path is necessary for sustainability, to keep our festival's voice alive and heard worldwide." (My emphasis)

The policy to which Ngai referred is the City of Toronto's Declaration of Non-Discrimination. The city "requires that all organizations and individuals adopt the Declaration of Non-Discrimination as a condition of receiving funding or other support from the City."

The language of the declaration is quite precise: "On behalf of and with the authority of the organization named below, I hereby declare that this organization adopts and upholds the City of Toronto's policy statement which prohibits discrimination and harassment and protects the right to be free of hate activity..."

Pride organizers accepted the terms of the city's declaration and signed on.

Two weeks later, Tracey Sandilands, executive director of Pride Toronto, elaborated further upon the decision to ban the use of the abusive term "Israeli Apartheid."

She told The CJN that Pride had received many complaints from participants in last year's parade who felt the atmosphere of the parade had become "unsafe."

"For that reason," Sandilands said, "we asked members of QuAIA to revaluate their approach when participating in Pride activities. QuAIA is not being banned from this year's festival. We are restricting the use of words and phrases that can promote a poisonous atmosphere and detract from the goal of celebrating diversity within our community. No Canadian, queer or straight, should have to worry about their safety in public space because of who they are or what they believe... Let us be clear: criticism of Israeli government policy is legitimate. The atmosphere created by the use of the words 'Israeli apartheid' in the last three years of the Pride Festival are not [legitimate]." (My emphasis)

Some two weeks later, after the City of Toronto handed over a cheque in excess of $120,000 to the Pride Parade, the parade organizers reversed their decision: QuAIA would be allowed to raise high their grossly offensive banner after all.

In a statement on June 23, the organizers explained the complete about-face: "Pride places the responsibility for determining a violation of city policy back in the hands of the city, as our review process has not established that violation."

The city, however, quickly pointed out that they can only enforce the policy against city employees (Pride Toronto organizers are not city employees) or against a city-run event (the Pride Parade is not a city-run event). The city relies on the honour and the integrity of funding recipients if they are not city employees to abide by the declaration they sign.

Thus, in one clipped paragraph, Pride organizers dismissed their prior statements about "Israeli apartheid" as no longer operative. Why?

"To respect and follow city policies" now meant something other than it had meant less than one month earlier. Even though the city gave funding for the parade to Pride Toronto and not to QuAIA, the Pride board adopted the view that they could comply with their declaration to the city by passing off the fulfilment of the promise they had signed to QuAIA itself.

Was Sandilands being truthful when she said, "We are restricting the use of words and phrases that can promote a poisonous atmosphere and detract from the goal of celebrating diversity within our community"? If she was being truthful at the time, why did she and/or her board change her/their mind?

Why were words (Israeli apartheid) that created a poisonous atmosphere considered to be a violation of the city's policy "prohibiting discrimination and harassment and [that] protects the right to be free of hate activity" one month earlier, but no longer so?

The organizers of last week's parade have not explained themselves. They should feel no pride in what they did.

'Experiential education' of camp linked to identity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The lines between formal and informal education are blurring, according to Ron Polster, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's director of Jewish camping.

"Schools are recognizing the need to become more informal, and camps are recognizing the need to have curriculum. Nobody likes to use that word," he said in a recent interview at his office at the Lipa Green Centre. "Whether it's on a Jewish level or not... we want to not only develop their skills in canoeing, but we want them to experience Shabbat."

Ron Polster

A prime example of the newer approach can be seen at the Union for Reform Judaism's Camp George, where Polster spent five years as camp director. This year, Rabbi Noam Katz, a musician and educator with a master's degree in Jewish education, became Camp George's first "dean of Jewish living." His position is unique for its dual aspect – Rabbi Katz will be at camp during the summer and, during the school year, at Leo Baeck Day School.

The "experiential education" aspect – a term Polster prefers to "informal education" – is part of an "understanding that one of the real benefits of Jewish overnight camp is that it's a joyous celebration."

From the time he was 12 years old until he began working for the federation three years ago, Polster spent every summer at Jewish overnight camp. The 43-year-old Cleveland native went through the Ramah system in Ontario as both a camper and a staff member. He has a PhD in philosophy of religion from the University of Toronto and has lived here since 2002.

Drawing on his own experience as well as research by the federation and the Federation for Jewish Camp, Polster says there's a natural connectivity between camp and attachment to Israel, and between camp and Jewish community.

More than 60 Israeli shlichim work at the eight Jewish overnight camps affiliated with the federation, Polster noted. As well, he added, other camps that serve the local Jewish population have also started to have Israelis on staff.

Aside from Camp Kadimah – which is located in Nova Scotia but draws 70 per cent of its camper population from the GTA – the other overnight camps Polster works with are located in Ontario: Camp George, Camp Gesher, Camp Moshava, Camp Northland-B'nai Brith, Camp Ramah, Camp Shalom and Camp Shomria.

At camp, he said, "Jewish community just happens."

Parents are also recognizing the role Jewish camps can play in building Jewish identity and creating a connection to the Jewish community, Polster said.

"In terms of infusing Jewish values and learning about Israel, and identity building – that happens at all of our camps, and not just on Yom Yisrael, where it's one day set aside for eating hummus and falafel. It's based on the Birthright [Israel] notion of mifgash – the encounter with another human being who happens to be from another country, who's able to articulate different culture, different values... that is a primary Jewish identity builder within the camps," Polster said.

Also, celebrating Shabbat together creates a sense of being "a part of something greater," he added.

Between them, the eight camps have more than 4,000 campers registered for this summer, an increase of about three per cent over the past three years.

This year, however, the numbers are "really static," in part because of the economy, said Polster. He noted that requests for camp tuition subsidies – distributed in Toronto through Jewish Family & Child, JIAS and by the camps themselves – are increasing.

About 600 or more children from low-income families receive subsidies for day and overnight camp though a subsidy program administered by JF&CS, he said.

The federation is also launching a 10-day camp program for children from the Russian-speaking community.

As well, federation's Top Bunk program, which had 275 participating campers last year, offers $1,250 per child for first-time Jewish overnight camp attendees who are in grades 2 to 7 and not attending a Jewish day school. This year, another 275 children are part of the program.

"For us, the most compelling statistic about [Top Bunk] was that 25 per cent of those kids had no Jewish education at all. And 90 per cent come back for a second summer."

At a cost of approximately $1,000 per week, unsubsidized, camp is a more modest investment than day school tuition, which ran this year in the $11,000 to $12,000 range for elementary and junior high school, and up to almost $19,000 for high school, at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Referring to anecdotal evidence, Polster added that some parents who don't send their children to Jewish day school send them to Jewish camp in the hope that the experience will strengthen their Jewish identity.

JF&CS program seeks to place kids with family

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sheryl Ederman, supervisor of resource development and support team at Jewish Family & Child, believes strongly that it takes a village to raise a child.

That's why she's spreading the word about the kinship program, run through the agency's child protection department.

The program came about, Ederman said, about five years ago when a change in the child welfare sector gave agencies the mandate to provide support to extended family to care for children who, for a variety of reasons, can't remain at home.

"This transformation has led us to a very broad definition of family. It means that anyone who has established a prior relationship with the child, such as aunts and uncles, neighbours, teachers or coaches, can come forward and present a plan to care for the child in need."

She said the change gave children's aid societies the responsibility to seek out kin for the child. "Few people come forward, though, so we need to explore all viable placement considerations ourselves."

> 'Anyone who has established a prior relationship with the child, can come forward and present a plan to care for the child in need'

The concept goes back to the way communities used to raise children. "If a child was in need, the community cared for that child. That's how foster care started."

Ederman said that children living with kin are not necessarily in the agency's care, but are overseen by a social worker. "Some children, though, do remain under our care while in a kinship home, which means these families have to follow all the guidelines and rules of a foster family."

The agency has on average 90 children in care at any given time, she said, and currently there are 11 children living in nine kinship homes. "Of those homes, five are grandparents, two others are family members, and two are in the child's extended community.

"If children can't live at home, the next best thing is having them live with someone they know. It's not always easy to find out who these people may be, though, so when a child is apprehended, we have to ask questions, such as 'Where do you have lunch?' or 'Have you had any sleepovers?' When we start to explore, we might figure something out."

If a family does come forward, Ederman said, the agency will then determine whether the child will remain under the agency's care, or whether they will just be overseen by a social worker.

"It's my hope that we can keep more children in the community. Research shows that children have a better future living in family-based care rather than residential care, and it also shows that children in kinship care exceed foster care outcomes.

"They achieve a higher education, which correlates to improved independence, self sufficiency, life opportunities and integration into the community."

She said that the agency's current funding doesn't allow staff to fill the kinship program to capacity. "This means children often experience two moves. Initially the child would be placed in a foster home while we search for a kinship home, and once they're settled, workers and family are often reluctant to disrupt them.

"We believe that with additional funding we could reverse this process, and when a child can't remain at home, they could be placed with someone familiar to them immediately, thereby using foster care as a second choice. As well, it would free up foster homes to be able to take in children who have nowhere else to go."

With extra funding, Ederman said, she could add extra staff to identify kin connections, and she could train staff to dig deeper to discover kin. "We need to enhance the kinship program."

Kulanu draws over 500 marchers

Flanders, who is Jewish and has lived in Israel, said Pride's purpose hasn't changed.

"Pride is what it's always been about, which is achieving equality," she said, adding that the group is trying to create a dialogue in the Jewish community about Israeli policy.

"Equal rights is about having a voice," she said. "I think debate is healthy… The core of American democracy is free speech. It shocks me when it's free speech for me but not for you."

Bob Rae, member of parliament for Toronto Centre who walked with both Kulanu and the Liberal Party at the parade, sees the term "Israeli apartheid" as discriminatory.

"I don't think it's an appropriate term. It's not something I support," he said, adding that that no country in the Middle East has been more supportive of human rights and gay rights than Israel.

About 500 marchers chanted and sang their way through the Church Wellesley Village with Kulanu on Sunday. Some covered themselves in rainbow flags, some in Israeli ones, some held signs, some clung to banners and others just marched.

Participants included mayoral candidate Ford and mayoral candidate Rocco Rossi, as well as members of Hillel and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The number of people who walked with Kulanu grew from around 125 last year, said Justine Apple, Kulanu Toronto's executive director. This year, about 500 people made up the Kulanu contingent.

"[The Jewish community] noticed there was a real need for action in the Jewish and Jewish LGBT community, considering there was an anti-Israel group present in the parade," she said. "By way of numbers, [we] showed everyone that we are very determined to support the State of Israel."

For Cáit R. Power, a first-year master's student in political science at McGill University, Pride's message is similar to the message she gets from the Jewish community.

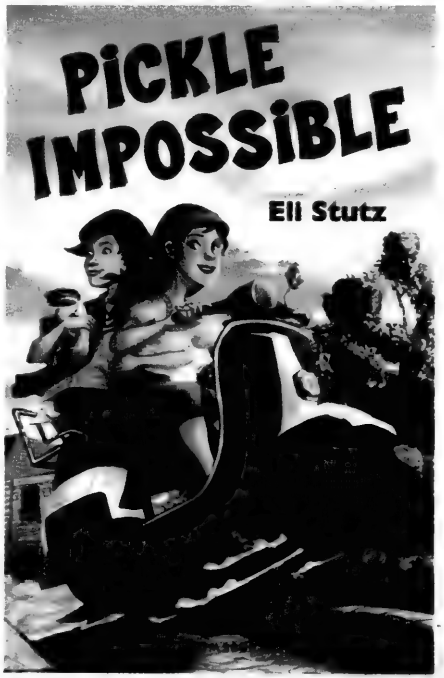
"I think Pride represents inclusiveness and that's how I see my Judaism," Power, 27, who identifies as queer, said. "I think Pride says we can be more than one thing, and us Jews, we're always more than one thing."

A bedtime story becomes a children's novel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

Eli Stutz knows his pickles well. He has to, having written an entire book on the subject.

Pickle Impossible (Bloomsbury Kids, USA) is his debut children's novel.



The 194-page book tells the story of 12-year-old French farm boy Pierre La Bouche as he tries to save the family pickle farm. He does this by bringing a jar of the crunchy gherkins to the international Pickleympics contest in Switzerland.

His journey, for readers aged eight to 12, is packed with mystery, history, chase scenes, against-all-odds escapes and lots of adventure.

True to its name, Pickle Impossible is full of pickles, both of the literal sour dill kind and the figurative predicament sort, which the protagonist overcomes with the help of a good friend, the book's somewhat unreliable narrator.

Although Pickle Impossible is his debut work, Stutz, 35, who made aliyah from Toronto in 1998, has lots of writing and storytelling practice thanks to his three kids, Shoham, 6; Shalhevet, 4, and Naftali, 2.

"I always had a knack for storytelling, but I didn't get to this level of writing until I became a father and started telling bedtime stories," says Stutz, who names J.R.R. Tolkien, C.S. Lewis and Roald Dahl among his influences.

The idea for Pickle Impossible came from one such bedtime story. One day, while eating a pickle, Stutz noticed a raisin container depicting an old man's face with bulging cheeks and a farm in the background. The idea for Henri La Bouche, Pierre's pickle farming grandfather, was born. Slowly but surely, the bedtime story evolved into a full-length adventure.

The story takes place in France, because the French are so cuisine-centric, says Stutz. Pickles are no exception. The gherkin pickle is a French delicacy. Stutz spoke to several French pickle farmers and pickling experts while writing the book. As well, France was a great location from which to launch a European adventure, he says.

"There is something funny about pickles. You just have to say the word 'pickle' and people will laugh," says Stutz. "They are quirky and tangy and sharp."

Of course, the story packs in much more than pickles and adventure. It also has a strong moral message.

Each member of Pierre's family is more eccentric than the next, while Pierre himself is intensely "normal," and at the beginning of the book feels plagued by being so average. His nickname, Cornichon, means good-for-nothing in French slang.

By the end, it turns out that his intense normalcy is his secret superpower. "It's the basic idea of a boy who thinks he's worthless learning that he has something special after all," says Stutz.

Former Torontonian, now writing from Israel, says: 'There is something funny about pickles'

Another theme in the book is acceptance. Pierre's sidekick, Aurore, is the loud, outspoken opposite of Pierre and yet they are the closest of friends.

"I thought these characters would be good foils to each other because of how different they are," says Stutz, "and yet they learn to get along and become great friends despite their differences."

Aurore also ends up teaching Pierre one of the book's key ethical messages – to be nice. Although Pierre is not naturally generous, Aurore's goodness rubs off on him. In the end, he shows that he has learned this lesson well.

"This idea – kindness toward others – is my Jewish background speaking out in the book," says Stutz.

The book also promotes the idea that impossible things can happen. "Seemingly impossible things happen every day," says Stutz. "The world is more amazing than we... think."

One such "impossible" thing happened to Stutz while he was putting the book together. He made his own pickles!

"They turned out quite well, and it was really fun to watch them turn into pickles," he says. In the end, he decided to publish his recipe, Geveret Chutzpadickerstein's Homemade Pickles, at the back of the book.

Eli Stutz

Stutz would like to see Pickle Impossible translated into both Hebrew and French and definitely sees himself writing more kids adventures in the future. He has already started on his next book, which will be about something "completely different," he says.

Stutz will appear in Toronto on a book tour. See him July 11 from 1-3 p.m. at Chapters/Indigo in the Eaton Centre or also on July 11 from 5-7 p.m. at Chapters/Indigo Yorkdale Mall. For more information, visit www.elistutz.com.

Can Ban be trusted?

Merely moments after he had been told of the violent outcome of the attempt on May 31 by the "Free Gaza" flotilla to break the Israeli blockade of Gaza, UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon felt justified in condemning Israel. He did not feel the need to wait until he had learned all the facts of the altercation.

"I am shocked by reports of the killing of people in boats carrying supplies to Gaza," Ban said. "I heard the ships were in international water. That is very bad. I condemn this violence. It is vital that there is a full investigation to determine exactly how this bloodshed took place. I believe Israel must urgently provide a full explanation."

It should be noted that the secretary general demanded answers from no one other than Israel. Moreover, he insisted that only an international panel could wring the "full explanation" out of the Israelis. He still clings to the irreplaceability of an international panel despite Israel's appointment of a five-person panel, including two international observers, to investigate the incident.

"The secretary general has taken note of Israel's announcement and recognizes that a thorough Israeli investigation is important, and could be consistent with the secretary general's own proposals for an international panel," the UN's special envoy to the Middle East, Robert Serry, commented.

Last week, Ban once again offered his opinions on Israel's role in creating friction in the region. He issued a report that explicitly pointed an accusing finger at Israel for having fomented tension with and heightening the possibility of conflict with Syria by deigning to point out that Hezbollah had received advanced Scud missiles from Syria. "Rhetoric escalated rapidly, creating a perception in the public that a resumption of conflict was imminent," the secretary general wrote.

Ban's report also summarily dismissed recent Israeli complaints that Hezbollah had orchestrated a number of attacks against UNIFIL troops stationed in southern Lebanon, in yet further violation of the terms of UN Security Council Resolution 1701, which ended the Second Lebanon War in 2006. Israel detailed at least three recent incidents in south Lebanon.

Ban did in fact refer to five such incidents in which UNIFIL troops were injured and in which their vehicles were stolen. But he refused to blame Hezbollah.

These responses by Ban may not prove to be a pattern. But they do appear to suggest a proclivity to blame the Jewish state across the board for the tensions in the region.

How, we ask, can he be entrusted, as the Charter of the United Nations requires, "to bring about by peaceful means in conformity with the principles of justice... settlement of international disputes... which might lead to a breach of the peace?" (Our emphasis)

It appears we cannot.

Not all the news fit to print

I was surprised by the choice of front page articles in the June 24 issue of The CJN ("Montreal rabbi urges Canadian role investigating Venezuelan anti-Semitism" and "CIC offers Israel trip to NDP's Layton"). I would have thought that stories about investigating Venezuelan anti-Semitism and the Canada-Israel Committee offering an Israel trip to the New Democratic Party's Jack Layton paled by comparison with reporting the massive protests by the haredi community in Jerusalem following the Israeli Supreme Court's ruling that segregation between school children in the haredi settlement of Immanuel must cease and sentencing the school's leaders to two weeks in prison for repeatedly refusing to obey the court's order.

Equally important – conceptually and politically – was a second ruling by the court, also ignored by The CJN, that it was unlawful to provide welfare payments to married yeshiva students when the same support was not provided to other married students.

This is not the first time The CJN has ignored important Israeli news stories. I spent most of April in Israel earlier this year. For much of this time, coverage in the Jerusalem Post and on Israeli TV channels was dominated by police investigations of huge bribes alleged to have been paid to senior Jerusalem municipal officials, including the deputy mayor, in connection with the construction of the massive Holyland Park residential complex in the city. I saw no reference to this major scandal in The CJN on my return to Toronto.

The CJN seems to feel that CJN readers aren't mature enough to face the reality that Israel, like all other modern democratic societies, faces enormously complex problems and that not everything is sweetness and light in the Promised Land.

No discrimination at haredi school

I am an Ashkenazi member of a Sephardi shul. The editorial in the June 24 CJN referred to "abhorrent discrimination" on the part of a certain haredi school in Immanuel, with separate entrances for Sephardi and Ashkenazi students ("The hurt that wounds deepest," June 24).

The school in question sought to discriminate only against individuals or families with undesirable objective behaviours or standards – standards not associated with their Ashkenazi or Sephardi origins (e.g., dress standards). Sephardim were accepted to the allegedly discriminatory school, making up apparently one-third of its student body, and a Sephardi rabbi – Eliyahu Biton – is one of the parents being imprisoned.

The representative of the Israeli Education Ministry apparently accepted that the school was willing to accept any student who would comply with its behavioural standards. As a result, from the perspective of the Ashkenazi and Sephardi parents, there is no discrimination, but rather secular courts interfering with their ability to isolate their children from bad influences (e.g., classmates having undesired media exposure). This is why 150,000 Orthodox people demonstrated against the imprisonment of the parents. We need to make an effort to attribute proper motives and attitudes to the great rabbis who support the conduct of these imprisoned parents.

Pride reversal

So, members of Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) were, after all, able to participate in the Toronto Pride Parade, and demonstrate against the only country in the Middle East where gays and lesbians are free from persecution ("Pride Toronto reversal condemned," July 1).

The complete lack of rational behaviour on the part of QuAIA reminds me of the 1950s and '60s when the then-Soviet Union gave enthusiastic support to the Egyptians but spurned the Israelis. This, in spite of the fact that all Communist party activities in Egypt were strictly banned, while the Knesset had several Moscow-oriented Communist members. It seems to me that when it comes to Israel-bashing, all logic is unfortunately dispensed with.

Jabotinsky was a Zionist visionary and warrior

By RABBI SHLOMO JAKOBOVITS

The tragic episode of the Altalena is well-known. The Irgun ship, heavily loaded with desperately needed armaments, reached Israel's coastal area during the War of Independence. It was sunk by gunfire by the Israel Defence Forces on the orders of David Ben-Gurion, with the loss of 15 Jewish lives and all its arms and ammunition.

What is less known is the derivation of this ship's name. Altalena was the pen name Zev Jabotinsky used for his numerous writings. The naming of the ship eight years after his death is a measure of the esteem accorded to him by his devotees.

And not only by members of his political party, but also by the broader Jewish public. If a man's status can be measured by how many sites are named after him, then Jabotinsky stands first. In Israel today, there are 57 streets, squares and parks bearing the name Jabotinsky. In comparison, 52 are named Herzl, while Chaim Weizmann, Ben-Gurion and Chaim Bialik have 48 each.

Jabotinsky was born in 1880 in Odessa, which was then in czarist Russia. He and his family had little contact with Judaism, and the Hebrew that he learned was merely the minimum required for a modest bar mitzvah ceremony. There was then no indication that he would one day become a master of Hebrew.

The Chibat Tzion drive for settlement in Palestine began when he was an infant, and it was, in fact, launched in his hometown, Odessa. But throughout his youth, Jabotinsky took no interest in it. Nor did he identify with the Zionist movement, which developed when he was a teenager. All this changed with the Kishinev pogrom of 1903. Suddenly he discovered his own Jewishness, and his entire outlook was transformed.

Kishinev is only 70 miles from Odessa, and Jabotinsky warned his community that a similar pogrom was likely to occur in Odessa. He quickly organized Jewish self-defence and thus embarked on a lifelong leadership role in Jewish combat. This was also an example of his amazing knack for predicting future events.

Long before his awakening to Jewishness, he was recognized as a child prodigy. His writings were published in Russian newspapers when he was a teenager, and they were judged to be brilliant. At age 18, he was appointed by two Russian newspapers to be their correspondent in Italy and Switzerland respectively. At this point, he was neither a Zionist nor a national leader, but what he had in common with them was a flair for journalism. Most of the Zionist leaders were indeed professional journalists, including Theodor Herzl, Max Nordau, Nathan Birbaum, Menacham Ussishkin and Naham Sokolov. In addition to journalism, Jabotinsky produced numerous other works, such as novels, essays, poetry, and translations of the classics. His collected writings were published after his death as a set of 18 volumes.

His competence in writing was matched by his legendary skill as speaker. And he was able to express himself effectively in Russian, English, Hebrew, Yiddish, French, German, Italian and Ladino. He mobilized these talents as soon as he identified with the cause of Jewish nationalism, and within a year of the Kishinev pogrom, he became a delegate at the Sixth Zionist Congress in 1904. His oratory drew large crowds, albeit many of his radical views were vehemently disputed.

At birth, Jabotinsky had been named Vladimir, which is the Russian word for wolf. After he became a leader in Jewish affairs, he was often referred to as Zev, which is the Hebrew for wolf.

Meanwhile, 5,000 miles away in Japan, there was another Russian Jew, born in the same year as Jabotinsky, in whom the flames of spontaneous combustion were kindling the fire of Jewish idealism. His name was Joseph Trumpeldor, and in the first 24 years of his life, he had experienced little exposure to Judaism. He was a captain in the czar's army, the highest-ranking Jewish military officer in Russia. In 1904-05, Russia was at war with Japan, and Trumpeldor was among the many thousands of Russians captured by the Japanese. While in the prisoner-of-war camp, he contemplated his mission in life and came to the conclusion that he should be serving the Jewish people rather than the arch-anti-Semite, Czar Nicholas of Russia.

So after the war he and some of his comrades travelled from city to city in Russia to set up military-training courses for Jewish youth and to persuade those trained young men to settle in Palestine. These volunteers then joined with local recruits and formed Hashomer, the first Jewish defence establishment in Palestine. Trumpeldor also made aliyah himself, and he was in Palestine when World War 1 broke out.

In 1915, Turkey entered the war on the German-Austrian side, and it immediately expelled from Palestine all active Zionists, among them Trumpeldor and Ben-Gurion. Both of them then settled temporarily in Alexandria. As fate would have it, Jabotinsky was at that very moment assigned to Alexandria as a war correspondent. There he met Trumpeldor, and the two immediately bonded. They were in full accord on policy and worked effectively as a team.

Also in Alexandria, Jabotinsky met Ben-Gurion, and these two immediately found themselves in disagreement. At that juncture, the issue was what position Zionists should take in relation to the two sides now at war. Ben-Gurion counselled neutrality, while Jabotinsky pressed for getting involved on the British side. He predicted that regardless of which side won the war, the Ottoman Empire would disintegrate, thus opening up the opportunity for a Jewish state in Palestine.

This disagreement was the first of many, and the friction between these two strong personalities would continue for the next 50 years. Jabotinsky died in 1940, but Ben-Gurion's animosity toward him made itself felt long thereafter.

In his policy of supporting the British war effort, Jabotinsky sought to persuade the government in London to include in its army a distinctly Jewish component. Despite significant British resistance to this idea, Jabotinsky did attain partial success. The British army agreed to set up a quasi-military unit consisting entirely of Jewish personnel – the military function would be transportation only, not actual fighting. This force of 650 men, organized in 1915 by Trumpeldor and known as the Zion Mule Corps, was the first Jewish military body in 19 centuries.

But Jabotinsky was not satisfied. He wanted a Jewish segment of the regular British army, and in 1917 Britain finally agreed. Thus the Jewish Legion came into being, a fighting force in which each soldier wore a small menorah as identification.

The legion fought on the Turkish front, and Jabotinsky participated in Gen. Edmund Allenby's triumphant march through Jerusalem. That march took place during Chanukah of 1917, and world Jewry noted its affinity with the Maccabean triumph of 21 centuries earlier, which is what Chanukah commemorates. The Balfour Declaration of 1917 had been issued the previous month, and Jabotinsky contributed to its formulation. The convergence of these two events was deemed to portend historic happenings to come.

During the era of World War I, Zionist public pronouncements spoke only of a Jewish national home. No one mentioned Jewish statehood, as Herzl and his colleagues had done. The British government and the Arab leadership were in favour of a Jewish national home in Palestine under the British flag, but would have been totally opposed to any suggestion of an independent Jewish state.

However, in 1920, after the British Mandate was established, Zionists no longer hid their aims and they spoke openly of plans for statehood. Thereupon Arabs rioted in several locations and Jews found themselves in serious danger, especially in Jerusalem and Jaffa. The mandatory government was taken by surprise; nor at this juncture had they yet set up an effective police force. Ben-Gurion, having failed to come out strongly on the British side in the war, was for the moment in the background, and thus the de facto leader of the Yishuv was Jabotinsky.

Jabotinsky quickly took matters into his own hands. He organized a Palestinian Jewish army and deployed it wherever a Jewish neighbourhood came under attack. That small army was soon named Haganah and, in 1948, became the national defence forces of Israel, known today as Zahal (Israel Defence Forces).

Strictly speaking, Jabotinsky's military activities were illegal, and he was arrested by the British and sentenced to 15 years imprisonment. But the outcry in Palestine, England and America against this arrest was so vehement that he was quickly released.

On economic policy, Jabotinsky was a right-winger and favoured private enterprise. Ben-Gurion, in contrast, was a left-winger and identified with the worker movements. The majority of Jews in Palestine favoured the left, and thus Ben-Gurion was able to re-establish his leadership. Jabotinsky's party didn't come into power until 1977, 37 years after his death. This party at first was known as Revisionist, then Cherut, and today Likud. Ben-Gurion gradually took over the Haganah, which Jabotinsky had founded, and in 1937 Jabotinsky established his own military force, known as Irgun. This force helped significantly to maintain immigration into Palestine in defiance of British restrictions, and it played a major role in bringing about the end of British rule.

The mainstream Zionist movement, not wanting to be perceived as rebels against the British Mandate, had in the 1920s and 1930s toned down its call for a Jewish state. But Jabotinsky never wavered, and the state he loudly espoused was to include both sides of the Jordan. Jewish statehood implied termination of the mandate, and Jabotinsky's ceaseless promotion irked the British government. Accordingly, in 1929, while Jabotinsky was on a speaking tour in South Africa, the authorities announced that he would not be allowed back into Palestine – this despite the fact that he had taken up residence there.

With Hitler's rise to power in the 1930s, Jabotinsky directed his energies to warning eastern European Jewry of impending disaster. He predicted that German armies would invade Poland and the Baltic countries, and he went from city to city urging Jews to leave before it would be too late. His effectiveness was undermined by two very disparate groups. The Bund, an anti-Zionist movement that was influential with secular Jews referred to him as "a political charlatan" and ridiculed his advice. And many of the rabbis, whose opinions carried weight with religious Jews, belittled him as "a non-believer and non-observer" and discounted his predictions. In addition, finding a haven where a Jew could enter legally and make a living was extremely difficult. Hence Jabotinsky's warnings were not successful, and a few years later eastern European Jewry fell victim to the Holocaust.

In his will, Jabotinsky predicted that there would be a Jewish state and he expressed the wish to be buried there. But he did not want to be brought there until the government itself made the arrangements. Apparently, he anticipated that Ben-Gurion would be in power and that he would not accord him a state funeral. All this is precisely what in fact happened: the state was established in 1948, but Jabotinsky's remains were not brought there until 1964, immediately after Ben-Gurion's retirement.

Jabotinsky died suddenly on the 29th of Tamuz in 1940, while visiting a Betar camp in United States. Betar, which stands for Brit Trumpeldor, is a worldwide youth movement that Jabotinsky had established in 1923 and named after his close colleague. He was buried in a New York cemetery, followed by his wife, Yohanna, in 1955. Israel's funeral for him and his wife in 1964 was a spectacular event, unmatched in the history of Israel. The procession passed through the streets of New York, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem on the way to his re-interment on Har Herzl, and the total attendance was estimated at 250,000.

Jabotinsky's yahrzeit this year falls on July 11.

The world turned upside down

It takes a certain courage to challenge the entrenched dogmas – and pervasive hypocrisy – of such topics as secularism, environmentalism, moral relativism, anti-Americanism, anti-Zionism and multiculturalism

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

But in her latest book, The World Turned Upside Down: The Global Battle Over God, Truth, and Power (Encounter Books, 2010), Melanie Phillips has done just that. By appealing for sanity and the promotion of defensible evidentiary constructs to counteract the plague of deceit and intolerance that flies insidiously under the umbrella of political correctness and post-modernist sophistry, Phillips has produced a tour de force that is a must-read for anyone who wishes to push back against the moral and intellectual inversions that dominate the so-called "progressive" discourse in academia, politics and the media.

In her first few chapters which address, among other themes, "the myth of environmental armageddon," "scientific triumphalism," "the secular inquisition" and "the jihad against western freedom," Phillips pulls no punches in her rebuke of what she has described as a departure from rationality, a mass derangement – where opinion trumps factual evidence and there is no distinction between truth and lies, justice and injustice, and victims and victimizers.

While delving nimbly and insightfully into a broad range of anomalies, she tends to focus much more specifically – and trenchantly – on the dangers of Islamist extremism and the uniquely ignominious treatment of Israel, not only by its recognized Arab enemies, but also, and even more particularly so, by "the left-wing western intelligentsia" and their fellow travellers. In connecting animus against Zionism with more global intolerance, Phillips asserts that "Israel stands proxy for a rational and moral outlook because, of all the causes in the world, it alone has been singled out for systematic demonization built on fabrication, distortion and misrepresentation."

She goes on to argue that "if people stand truth and logic on their heads over Israel, it is very likely that they will do so elsewhere – not least because so much of the irrationality within the West rests at the most fundamental level on its denial or renunciation of Jewish moral precepts." This, in turn, bolsters Islamist aspirations "to eradicate Israel, subjugate the Jews, and erase the precepts of Judaism that Islam believes it supersedes."

The World Turned Upside Down, in all of its more than 450 pages, is elegantly written, easy to read, and always thought-provoking. As with her previous book, Londonistan (which deals presciently with the threatened Islamification of Britain), Phillips' current offering pushes buttons that urgently need to be pushed and sounds alarm bells that, if not heeded, will almost certainly bring democracy and western values to the brink of collapse.

An optimist's take on the haredi school fiasco

The Beit Yaakov girls' school in the haredi West Bank town of Immanuel has been at the heart of a religious, ethnic and legal clash that has touched one of Israel's most sensitive nerves: the relationship between the State and its growing haredi population.

There are four types of schools in Israel: secular, Orthodox, haredi and private. The first three receive government funding. Secular and religious schools are "national," with curricula set by the Ministry of Education. Haredi schools are independent, considered "recognized unofficial" institutions.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Toward the end of the 2007 school year, new partitions were built in Beit Yaakov. In essence, two separate learning institutions were created – one for girls from chassidic families and another for those from other families. Almost all the girls in the former were Ashkenazi. All the girls in the latter were Sephardi.

Besides the partitions, separate entrances, teachers' rooms, schoolyards and recess times were established for each of the schools. The girls in the Sephardi institution were required to wear new uniforms, unlike those worn by their erstwhile classmates.

When Sephardi girls' parents' complaints to Immanuel's municipality and the Ministry of Education weren't addressed, they petitioned the Supreme Court, claiming their daughters were being ethnically discriminated against and demanding the new walls be taken down and the two schools be reunited as one.

During months of hearings, the Chassidim's argument was that the issue had nothing to do with ethnicity, but rather with pupils' level of religiosity. They said the school hadn't been split into two, but rather that a chassidic wing had been added where pupils were required to be more observant.

In August 2008, the court ruled the school had illegally harmed its Sephardi pupils' dignity by segregating them from their classmates. It referred to the landmark American case of Brown v. the Board of Education, adding that "separate but equal" education was unacceptable. It also declared that while it was reasonable for schools to make acceptance to certain courses of study contingent on preconditions, this was unacceptable if prerequisites included elements of ethnicity, as it found was the case in Beit Yaakov.

The court ordered authorities to tear down the partitions and remove all traces of ethnic discrimination.

With the onset of the new school year last fall, the chassidic parents refused to send their daughters to Beit Yaakov. The Sephardi parents returned to the court, asking that it declare the Chassidim in contempt.

After several more hearings, during which the Chassidim reiterated that their rabbis forbade sending their daughters to school with non-Chassidim, the court lost its patience. It ordered two week imprisonment for any parent refusing to abide by its ruling and fined them per diem for abstention.

Haredi demonstrations ensued, and 100,000 people accompanied chassidic fathers on their way to a Jerusalem police station.

There's been a public outcry. A leading chassidic rabbi, the Slonim Rebbe, proclaimed he'd rather go to the firing squad than capitulate. Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, spiritual head of Shas, the Sephardi-haredi party, said such issues should never reach the country's secular courts, but rather religious tribunals.

Legal commentators argued about the wisdom of the court's decisions. Counter-demonstrations called for denying government funding to schools that discriminate.

In the latest round of this fray, in late June, the court ordered the chassidic fathers' release after being informed of an about-face agreement between the Slonim Rebbe and Rabbi Yosef, according to which all girls in Beit Yaakov would spend the last three days of the school year together and attend lectures on the need for unity, and after hearing of steps taken to ensure the school re-opens in a non-segregated environment.

Given these understandings, the court also ordered the parties to report back in August to guarantee that its ruling is carried out.

The importance of this case can't be overstated. Beyond its rule-of-law significance, it's another step on the meandering path that will bring haredim into the fold. Major rabbis now more often understand the need to enter into discourse with the state to help solve complex predicaments that have lain dormant for decades within their own communities.

I'm an optimist.

The Gaza flotilla and the dirty NGO war

The images from the "peace" flotilla to Gaza exposed the tactics of powerful non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that lead the strategy of political warfare targeting Israel. In the May 31 flotilla attack, IHH – a Turkish "charity" with close links to Hamas and jihadist groups – combined forces with European anti-Israel campaigners, including the International Solidarity Movement (ISM). Members of both groups co-operate with terrorists that goad Israel into using force, resulting in injuries and deaths. They know how to unleash massive diplomatic and political campaigns using false charges of "war crimes," "collective punishment" and similar allegations.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The Israeli government has been remarkably and depressingly inept in dealing with this third-generation warfare (following conventional army attacks from 1948 to 1973, and the ongoing terror campaigns). In the case of the IHH-ISM "free Gaza" flotilla, the IDF and Defence Ministry were surprised by the violence, and the political leadership, led by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, didn't anticipate the international pressure to end the Gaza blockade. (When they acted to allow most civilian goods into Gaza, it was another case of too little, too late.)

In order to defeat this third-generation warfare, which has already done considerable damage, we need to assess the threat and find the right strategy. Understanding NGO exploitation of moral principles is the first step. The IHH and ISM were supported by a wide network, including the major NGO superpowers (Amnesty International, Oxfam, Human Rights Watch) and many local partners. This network creates the environment that automatically condemns Israel, while portraying Palestinians as helpless victims.

This illicit political influence has been visible in Canada, where self-promoting radicals initially funded by Liberal governments have waged political war against Israel, the United States and other democracies. When the Harper government ended their taxpayer funding, the NGOs fought back with all their power, mobilizing allies in Radio-Canada, the Toronto Star and Maclean's.

I recently observed the wrath of the NGO network at the European Parliament's subcommittee on human rights in Brussels. A hearing, ostensibly on civil society in Israel, was initiated by NGOs under the façade of promoting peace and human rights. As in Canada, these powerful NGOs have a great deal to lose if Europe's secret funding mechanisms are opened to public scrutiny.

The session opened with speeches from three EU-funded NGO speakers – a fringe Israeli who heads PCATI (the "Public Committee Against Torture in Israel"), Mossawa (led by radical Israeli-Arabs), and the Euro-Med Human Rights Network, which co-ordinates demonization among these and similar groups. Each spoke for more than 10 minutes, repeating the standard anti-Israel rhetoric, and praising bogus human rights defenders, including the IHH/ISM "Free Gaza" terrorists.

I was invited to present a different perspective by one of the few Euro MPs who knows enough about the reality in Israel to distinguish fact from fiction and recognize the need for a fact-based analysis of NGO agendas and the secret EU funding they enjoy. This was a major departure from the standard ideological monopoly, and the NGO network made a major effort to prevent me from speaking by falsely claiming that I and NGO Monitor are agents of the Israeli government. After losing the battle, they convinced the chair to limit me to five minutes, after they had spoken for 30. (Foreign diplomats get five minutes, and the Israeli diplomat used his time effectively.)

I eventually got my 10 minutes, and surprised many of the EU officials with detailed evidence of NGO manipulation and coarse immorality. This was one small battle in the NGO-led dirty war against democracy, in general, and against Israel, in particular. The Harper government has also made important progress in this area, as has Australia. If Europe's role in aiding third-generation NGO warfare against Israel is also exposed and then halted, this will mark a turning point.

We must win many more battles, focusing on the NGO groups that exploit and destroy moral principles, and on the funding sources that facilitate their dirty warfare. But at least we understand the threat, have a rational strategy and some solid allies, and a few initial successes to give hope.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Life after life

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH

Rabbinic Reflections

It is not uncommon today to find more people turning toward a spiritual soul-searching, seeking answers to the two greatest mysteries – life and death, and the afterlife. One reason this has become more prevalent is that these issues confront a generation where science of the 21st-century has the technology to understand the complexity of life itself and the wonderful discoveries beyond our world.

So what is life after life? When we live a full life, engaging in the challenges of everyday life only to reach a point where we recognize our vulnerability and finite physical existence, what happens when our time comes to leave this earthly plane? Does the soul live on, and if so, where does it go and what becomes of our conscious personality as we know it?

These are powerful questions that this humble article will attempt to answer briefly. Let's begin with a Mishnah in Talmud Babli Sanhedrin: "All Israel have a share in the world to come."

According to the Kabbalah, the esoteric teachings of the Torah, a soul comes into this world to fulfil some purpose. The soul's parents are chosen as well as the life conditions to assist that purpose. When a child is born, there is great joy on the physical plane. However, on the spiritual plane, the process of being born here is a passing-on from the spiritual world, and it's an event of solemn joy – because there is still work to do on the Earth plane, and as long as a soul embodies a physical body, its sensitivity is dimmed and challenged.

The work of all souls is to elevate their spiritual status to the maximum allotted in a lifetime. Once a soul is born in this world, its moral actions are the determining factors of its growth. Wealth, health and associations are decided for that particular lifetime, but the free will a person is entitled to lies in the realm of moral choice. Here is where our life is examined on the spiritual plane.

The Almighty offers us the opportunity to grow spiritually through our moral conduct, and this is encased in the teachings of our Torah. Causing pain to others carries a heavy price that could take a whole lifetime to correct. Conducting our personal and business affairs with integrity is today the hallmark of a tzaddik. Whether for a member of the clergy or a simple man or woman, the law is the same, with no exceptions. The more learned a person is, the more that's expected at the moral level.

When our time comes to leave this world, we pass on in a state of unconsciousness, and according to the Kabbalah, we awaken and are born in the spiritual world with all our memory and personality. We are given the opportunity to be our own witness at our judgment in the Heavenly Court, and we are taught through an all-encompassing love to see where we failed and why. It's important to understand here that we are given the opportunity to plead our case.

Once the judgment is pronounced, we can rest awhile, acquire more spiritual knowledge and gradually rise to higher levels. The good deeds we leave behind and the children who remember us for good by their own good actions are also a means to elevate our soul. The recital of Kaddish by the children especially is a demonstration of profound love and respect for the parents and the honour accorded to the Almighty in these difficult times.

The God I believe in

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

It is now four years since Richard Dawkins attacked religion with his challenging book The God Delusion. What followed was a spate of God-mocking volumes.

The secular position is clear. As people become better educated and more prosperous, they grow increasingly skeptical of religion's premises and less in need of its promised consolations. Atheists, past and present, are convinced that the demise of religion is inevitable – even if it is taking longer than expected. As a colleague assured me, somewhat inelegantly, "It's pretty tough to get rid of God."

Dawkins and cohort are looking in the wrong direction, suffering from a limited conception of God. When Moses said to God, "Let me behold thy presence," God answered, "Man may not see me and live, but I will make all my goodness pass before you." God is incarnate in the goodness, the yearnings and the glory of human beings.

I believe that God is potential in every human experience, waiting to become real, or to be driven away; in every human relationship, waiting to come to life, or to be cast aside. Like a mighty ocean that flows at high tide on to the shore, covering the sand and filling the rocky caves, and then ebbs away, yet all the time is the same majestic ocean, so God ebbs and flows into and out of our life.

I see God every day in the lives of people. I see Him in the hallways of hospitals where anxious sons and daughters count the hours while a parent lies prostrate on a bed of pain. I see God in the dedicated men and women who devote their time and energies to the numerous institutions for human rescue, without honour and without recognition. I see God in every relationship of loving and helping and giving, between parents and children, between husbands and wives, between friends and comrades.

He is present in every struggle against injustice and exploitation; in every anxious tear shed over another's sorrow; in every courageous fight for righteousness.

In his famous essay, A Free Man's Worship, Bertrand Russell declares that "the life of man is a long march through the night, surrounded by invisible foes, tortured by weariness and pain, towards a goal that few can hope to reach, and where none may tarry long.

"One by one, as they march, our comrades vanish from our sight, seized by the silent orders of omnipotent Death."

This is a bleak and hopeless view, without ultimate meaning or purpose. Instead, we can forge a world of more coherence than chaos when we bring goodness and purpose to our lives.

There is a story of a boy who use to wander off to spend time alone in the forest. One day his father asked him what he was doing. "I go to the forest to find God," said the boy. "That's wonderful," replied his father. "But you need not go to the forest. Don't you know that God is the same everywhere? "God is," the boy answered, "but I'm not."

We can be our best selves everywhere whenever we are compassionate, helpful and concerned.

A Hindu sage has written, "We were made to stand on the shore, to celebrate the sun and the sky, to use the wind and master the water, to care passionately for the children tumbling about the sand. We were made to embrace our fellows everywhere and struggle for peace among nations."

Nothing is harder, but anything else is sheer madness.

Jewish Life

The urgency of teaching about Israel

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

One of the potentially disturbing trends in Jewish education is whether young people feel connected to and knowledgeable about Israel. In a recent study by Steven Cohen and Ari Kelman, titled Beyond Distancing: Young Adult American Jews and their Alienation from Israel, an ambivalent picture emerges. Asked to reply to a series of statements about Israel, respondents under 35 displayed a consistent pattern of less than enthusiastic affirmation of the Jewish state. When confronted with the proposition, "If Israel were destroyed, I would feel as if I had suffered one of the greatest personal tragedies of my life," only 34 per cent checked off the choice "agree strongly."

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

On the other hand, 82 per cent considered themselves supporters of Israel, and more than two-thirds weren't uncomfortable with the idea of Israel as a Jewish state, regardless of their views on pluralism and diversity. So the news is mixed.

This should come as little surprise. Whereas Baby Boomers brimmed with pride at the bravery manifested in the Six Day War and the rescuing of hostages at Entebbe, Jews born after 1974 are, as Cohen notes, drawing on memories "less likely to cast Israel in a positive, let alone heroic light. The First Lebanon War in 1982, the First Intifadah, the Second Intifadah and the Second Lebanon War are all perceived as far more morally and politically complex than the wars Israel fought between 1948 and 1974, casting Israel in a more troubling light."

With its position constantly attacked in major media organs, academic institutions and international forums, it's little wonder that Israel's reputation today is the subject of fierce debate. Certain repeated patterns in the survey are worth taking note of, one of which is that those who practise Judaism more regularly and relate to Israel not just as a political entity but as a spiritual home consistently scored highest in terms of their Israel affiliation. Thus, if we want students to feel strongly about the Jewish state, we need to educate them not just about Israel but about Judaism itself.

But given that this is a technology savvy generation, with access to instant information, we must evaluate both the message and the content that we deliver. An Israel syllabus must not only represent the traditional emphasis on the biblical roots of the Jewish connection to the land, but also must contend with basic questions of how to construct an Israel curriculum today.

Some of those questions might be: How does the shadow of the Holocaust affect the mindset of Israelis? Should the "Palestinian narrative" about Israel be taught alongside Zionist ones – regardless of one's political orientation – because it's crucial for all Jewish students to be able to critically assess such narratives? Is Israel a "holy" land, and what does the idea of sacred space mean? What is the nature of secular-religious relationships in Israel today? What is the argument over "the settlements" and its relationship to the peace process? What is the line between a "just war" and an unethical military campaign, and how do human rights figure in the midst of armed conflict? Has traditional anti-Semitism morphed into anti-Zionism?

The task is urgent and cannot brook delay, as we must decide what are the fundamental educational priorities in the Jewish community of tomorrow.

Jewish apps for your iPhone

Do you have an iPhone or iPod touch that is hungering for Jewish and Israeli content? An ever-growing number of free apps – mini applications or programs – are available for downloading. Although the following apps weren't designed for the iPad, they'll work on the tablet device, too.

Jewish & Digital
By Mark Mietkiewicz

• iGavolt – Why shlep your bubbie around with you when you can download someone else's onto your iPhone? Listen to the iGavolt Bubbe utter such gems as, "It wasn't like that when I was your age," and the guilt inducing, "Why don't you call me anymore?" [http://bit.ly/happ55]

• Jewish Almanac – A nugget of Jewish wisdom and history for every day of the year. [http://bit.ly/happ51]

• Israel Pavilion at Expo 2010 – Even if you won't get a chance to visit the stunning stone and glass Israel Pavilion at the Shanghai fair this year, you can still drop by virtually. Includes a photo gallery and a video simulation. [http://bit.ly/happ57]

• Islamic calendar – If you've been searching for a quick way to convert dates back and forth between the Jewish and Muslim calendars, look no further. [http://bit.ly/happ59]

• Shnekel – Can an app be both mystifying and mesmerizing? Touch the screen and an assortment of Israeli coins drop down and flow away. Shake and repeat. Yup, that's about it. [http://bit.ly/happ60]

• Guess Who's Jewish – How encyclopedic is your knowledge of Jewish performers and celebrities? Test yourself by guessing the Jew in these pairs.

(a) Jenna Elfman or (b) Michael Bolton

(c) Joey Ramone or (d) Chris Klein

(e) Judd Nelson or (f) Joy Behar

The answers are below. [http://bit.ly/happ61]

• Mitzvah Project – "Whether you're preparing for your bar or bat mitzvah or at any time in your life, Mitzvah Project will guide you through identifying interests, goals, and actions to plan and implement a project that will make a difference." [http://bit.ly/happ62]

• Vegetable Checking Guide – Would you care for some beetles with your asparagus? How about maggots with your cabbage? Let's hope not, because bugs are not kosher. This illustrated app shows you how to find and rid your veggies of insects. [http://bit.ly/happ63]

• iBirkat – Did you have a good meal? Then it's time to say Birkat Hamazon. This app has variations for Ashkenazi, Sephardi, Oriental and Arizal (followers of Rabbi Isaac Luria) communities. [http://bit.ly/happ64]

When I did my first roundup of Jewish apps for the iPhone earlier this year, I got feedback from Palm and BlackBerry users who also wanted to know about Jewish apps for their devices. The truth is that app development for the iPhone (more than 225,000) dwarfs the others (with Palm at 3,000 and BlackBerry at 7,000). But that doesn't mean you need to go without.

The best place to look for Jewish software for your Palm is PilotYid.com [http://PilotYid.com]. Ari Engel has done a masterful job in scouring the web for Palm apps that you can download. [http://bit.ly/happ65] BlackBerry users can download classic texts, including the Chumash, Tehillim, the entire weekday siddur and guides to the Jewish festivals. [http://bit.ly/happ66]

As for the iPad, since its release in April, more than 10,000 apps have been created. When the time is right, I'll review Jewish and Israeli apps available for that device.

My G20 experience

By SAMMY KATZ
Special to The CJN

Sammy Katz

Guest Voice

On Sunday, June 27, a day after I watched members of the so-called Black Bloc destroy parts of downtown Toronto, I took to the street again with my camera.

I ended up watching the crowd of nearly 1,000 people march peacefully to Queen Street and Spadina Avenue, where they were met by at least 100 police officers.

The demonstrators began to have some sort of street party in the middle of the intersection, with music playing and people dancing. Many people turned it into a sit-in.

The police had already blocked any access to Spadina Avenue heading north, and within a matter of minutes, Queen Street West was also blocked. At that point I realized that I should probably leave, as I was not there to demonstrate against the G20, but just to take pictures.

Within seconds of my decision, groups of riot police showed up in full gear to block off the remaining exits from the intersection, as well as to take over the positions of the police on bicycles.

We were never once given a warning to leave and at this point were barred from exiting the intersection.

In groups of four, riot police officers would enter the crowd, grab someone by the neck and arrest them.

The police began to close in on what would become known as the "human box," hitting their batons against their shields, and yelling, "Move!"

My first instinct was to stick with members of the media. I immediately saw Francis D'Souza from CityTV, who seemed very shaken up, and stood next to him, as I assumed the police wouldn't harm or arrest members of the media. The members of the accredited press got together and negotiated their release with police, only to be put in zip ties once they exited.

As it started pouring rain (I later learned that Toronto was under a severe thunderstorm watch), I immediately started looking through my phone to see who could help me and other innocent bystanders around me to get out of this situation.

I was standing next to a man who was out walking his dog, as well as a couple who was going out for dinner, and many other people who just happened to be at the wrong place at the wrong time. I urgently got in contact with a reporter I knew from the local news station CP24, who managed to broadcast me live via phone on the station.

Within minutes, the staff at CP24 had contacted the mayor, chief of police and the head of the integrated security unit, all of whom would not comment on the situation.

After nearly two hours of standing in the rain and pressure on public officials by the media, those that were left in the "human box" were allowed to leave, while close to 150 people were arrested.

Soaking wet, freezing, hungry and needing a bathroom for the past six hours, I learned that this was a weekend that the City of Toronto would never forget.

Jewish student federation recognizes campus activists

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

The Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS) celebrated their members' accomplishments at the organization's second annual awards night recently.

The June 27 event brought nominees, family and friends to the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services.

Students from schools across Canada who have demonstrated their commitment to Jewish activism and Israel advocacy on campus attended.

Jay Solomon of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy's university outreach committee, right, presents an award for exceptional activism to Cara Lebenzon, vice-president of Israel affairs for Hillel Calgary. [Noah Gano photo]

This past year, Jewish and Zionist students faced many challenges once again, such as anti-Semitic graffiti, an attack with a machete and another year of Israeli Apartheid Week.

But Samuel Konig, a CFJS staff member, said this year wasn't necessarily worse than previous ones.

"It fluctuates over time," he said. "It's not like you can see a trend. It goes up and down."

He said some of the factors include the students and the geographical location.

But students must create programs proactively as well as reactively, he said.

"You have to strive when times are good as well," he said. "Activism should be throughout the year."

Cara Lebenzon, vice-president of Israel affairs for Hillel Calgary, won an award for exceptional activism. She said she spent two months in Israel last summer as part of the Taglit-Birthright Israel program.

"It was the first time I really felt a deep connection to Israel," she said. "Looking around me on campus, seeing the hate and the false information going around on campus, I knew there had to be someone to do something about it."

She didn't see enough presence of Hillel Calgary on campus, so she decided to get involved.

"I really wanted to bring out some positive information about Israel, as well as show people there are two sides to this story, and that they don't always need to listen to these people spreading hate against Israel," she said.

CFJS recently elected a new executive board for the upcoming school year. Shira Fenyes was elected as the incoming vice-president of programming.

"It's an amazing organization that offers so much leadership and amazing opportunities for all Jewish students around Canada," she said.

Fenyes is a student at the University of Saskatchewan, in Saskatoon. She said the Jewish community is small there, with about 30 Jewish students on her campus. As an executive, she said she wants to help empower the smaller campuses.

"I am hoping to work with leaders from campuses around Canada to come up with innovative and relevant programming to reach out to the smaller campuses as a member of a smaller community," she said.

Ashley Faintuch, incoming communications chair for CFJS, is part of the Jewish Students' Association at the University of Winnipeg, which won an award for collective advocacy initiative for its awareness campaign about the constant rocket attacks in Sderot, Israel.

She said there are a few hundred Jewish students on campus in Winnipeg, but it's not easy to recruit their help for Israel advocacy. But winning this award is sure to help.

"Being from Winnipeg with such a small campus in such a small city, in the past, we felt we were overlooked," she said. "To bring something so great home to Winnipeg is actually a really great feeling inside."

Reena

Laurine Schmelzle elected
Chair of Reena Board

At its Annual General Meeting held on June 23rd, Laurine Schmelzle was elected Chair of the Board of Reena.

Laurine Schmelzle has been a staunch supporter of Reena for many years and became a member of the Reena Board in 2006.

As a board member, Laurine chaired two crucial board committees, the Government Relations Committee which explores new initiatives, encourages ongoing dialogue with government ministries and elected members, and works with other groups as "one voice" when needed; the Reena Reena Foundation Communications Marketing Committee which ensures that the communications and marketing strategies of Reena and the Reena Foundation are continually reviewed and revised, ensuring that best practices are utilized in all communications and marketing. Laurine will continue to chair these committees " because I believe both of these portfolios are crucial to the core of the agency."

Laurine Schmelzle has a Bachelor of Religious Education from Tyndale University and a Bachelor of Arts from the University of Waterloo, with a major in Social Development Studies and Certificates in General Social Work and Child Abuse. Reena's goals and mission complement her current life vision and commitment: to help parents build strong families where children are given the opportunity to become all that they possibly can be.
"It is my great privilege to be a part of the Reena team. I consider it an honour to work alongside Sandy Keshen, President and CEO and the dedicated Reena staff and Board as we continue to carry out Reena's vital work of integrating people with developmental disabilities into the community."

ABOUT REENA

Reena is a non-profit social service agency dedicated to integrating individuals who have a developmental disability into the mainstream of society.

Reena was established in 1973 by parents of children with developmental disabilities, as a practical alternative to institutions. Reena strives to create and maintain an environment that respects and promotes dignity, individuality, independence and freedom of choice within a framework of Jewish culture and values. In 1977, Reena began receiving funding from the Ministry of Community and Social Services and, since that time, has grown rapidly.

Reena, together with the Reena Foundation, is now into the third year of a multi-million dollar campaign to build the Reena Community Residence at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Centre in Richmond Hill. Reena is the lead agency in this unprecedented model of shared service delivery with four partner agencies in the Toronto area: Chai Tikvah, Circle of Care, Jewish Family and Child and Kehilla. The residence will provide affordable, supportive housing for 84 persons with disabilities and will enable Reena to expand its residential day programs, life and job skills training and social programs for many people who have a developmental disability – all within a thriving and accepting campus community.

Economist shines light on nuclear hypocrisy

Yet another surprise from the Economist magazine. In its editorial, "Pakistan, India and the anti-nuclear rules" (June 26), the publication took a strong stand against the Egyptian-led effort to single out Israel at last month's Nuclear Non-Proliferation (NPT) Review Conference. The conference's final declaration, orchestrated by Egypt on behalf of the Arab League and as chair of the Non-Aligned Movement, explicitly called on Israel – but not Pakistan or India – to sign the NPT, and it omitted any mention of Iran, an NPT member, that is in serious violation of binding IAEA safeguards.

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

As the Economist noted: "Picking on Israel makes the silence – and hypocrisy – that surrounds nuclear-armed India and Pakistan all the stranger. Like Israel, neither joined the NPT, so their bomb-building did not break its rules. Yet their rivalry is fuelling the fastest, most dangerous build-up of bomb-usable plutonium and uranium anywhere. And a proposed sale by China of two civilian nuclear reactors to proliferation-prone, unstable Pakistan points to a further distinction. Although much of the world has co-operated over North Korea and Iran, everyone is competing over India and Pakistan to make things worse."

Despite all the anti-Israel propaganda, everyone knows – including Arab states – that Israel's (undeclared) nuclear arsenal is purely defensive and that Israel has always behaved responsibly. The real threat of aggressive, indeed potentially catastrophic, behaviour comes not only from North Korea and Iran, but also from Pakistan which has an intense, bitter rivalry with India. The danger of nuclear conflagration there is a serious, but largely unexamined, possibility, especially if Pakistan's weapons fall into the hands of the Taliban.

Now with China's renewed involvement in Pakistan's nuclear program (following U.S. help to India's program under former president George W. Bush), prospects for instability in Southeast Asia are only increasing. And the Economist reminds us that the history of China's proliferation record in Pakistan is nothing short of reckless: "[China] helped Pakistan make uranium and plutonium. It handed over the design of one of its own nuclear warheads, which Pakistan later passed on to Libya and possibly Iran."

China needs to be held to account, indeed needs to be "embarrassed," the Economist concludes.

But it probably won't be. After all, there's always Israel to conveniently distract the world's attention.

While Rick Salutin's June 25 Globe and Mail column didn't deal with the Middle East but with the "walling" off of large parts of Toronto for the G20 summit, his concern that this represented an assault on democracy in Canada has wider implications. Ironically, Salutin might not care to face the logic of his argument, given his support for the "Free Gaza" movement in his June 11 column.

Here's the relevant excerpt from his June 25 column: "Democracy isn't about elections. There have been lots of undemocratic societies with elections. It's about a state of mind and a relationship between governors and governed. This is exactly what looks preposterous in Toronto now. What is the sign of the breakdown in the relationship? Police everywhere, to protect the governors from the people. That's how it looks. I'm not saying that's what it is, yet. But it's amazing that they don't even react to the optics of the situation: i.e. a temporary police state."

Salutin is correct about what makes a governing authority a true democracy – not the mere mechanics of elections, but the far more meaningful nature of the governing authority itself. Today we read repeatedly that Hamas is the "democratically elected" government of the Palestinians in Gaza, who voted the group into power in the 2006 elections. Put aside for a moment the fact that Hamas only a year later staged a violent coup against Fatah's participation in the government. By Salutin's own definition, there's no sense in which Hamas has anything to do with democracy when it runs a repressive police state in which women's rights, gay rights, religious freedom, open dissent, etc., are non-existent.

As many analysts have noted, if the "Free Gaza" movement had any concern about freedom for the Palestinians and about democracy, they'd put their efforts into criticizing Hamas' extremist agenda and repressive rule, instead of working so assiduously to demonize democratic Israel – which is their real aim.

Orthodox college goes private

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL —TAV College, the largest of three Orthodox Jewish post-secondary institutions that faced having their government funding cut off, has become a private institution, but the fate of the other two remains undetermined.

TAV has been granted a permit from the Quebec education ministry to operate as a private college after demonstrating that it could continue independently, said its academic co-ordinator Eli Meroz. This not only secures the college's long-term future, but grants it an autonomy it did not have before and makes it eligible for funding at the rate of 60 per cent of the funds given to public colleges, or CEGEPs, he said.

TAV, which has about 600 students, was abruptly told by Education Minister Michelle Courchesne last December that its 25-year partnership with Collège Marie-Victorin, a public CEGEP through which TAV received government funding, would end.

She told the media that public money could no longer go to a college that has religion in its curriculum or religious restrictions, at least not through a public institution.

The other two institutions affected are the Lubavitch community's Bais Chaya Mushka Seminary and the Orthodox Beth Jacob Seminary, which both specialize in teacher and child-care training for women. They were also affiliated with Marie-Victorin for many years, and both are trying to form new partnerships with private colleges.

Meroz said there seemed to have been a misunderstanding in the ministry about TAV. It was founded by Lubavitch adherent Abraham Boyarsky, a Concordia University mathematics professor, to provide job training to chassidic Jews, but has changed considerably over its quarter-century history. Today, a little more than half its students could be described as Orthodox, said Meroz.

Its legal name is now TAV, which originally was an abbreviation for Torah and Vocational, Meroz said. For some years, there has been no religious instruction and classes are not automatically segregated by gender, he said.

Soccer dolls benefit women with HIV/AIDS

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ilan Schwartz has brought a little bit of the FIFA World Cup home to Canada.

The Winnipegger, who is 28 years old and a medical resident in Kingston, Ont., has introduced soccer-themed Little Travellers – inspired by the 2010 Soccer World Cup – to his Little Travellers doll offerings.

Each "footballer" comes with a "passport" to document the places where it goes. Customers are invited to post photographs of their dolls in different locations on www.littletraveller.org.za.

"We brought in just 350 of them," Schwartz says. "We wanted to bring in a limited number because we expect they will have a short shelf life. The demand has been strong. We got them in mid-June and we are almost sold out [at $8 apiece]."

Part of the money raised from the sale of the little dolls goes back to the South African craftswomen who make them. Most of these women have AIDS or are HIV positive.

Schwartz's family is originally from South Africa and came to Winnipeg in 1988. Ilan's father, Dr. Peter Schwartz, operates a veterinary clinic in west Winnipeg.

In 2005, Schwartz, then a medical student, volunteered as an intern in the Hillcrest AIDS Centre in the South African province of KwaZulu-Natal where it's estimated that 40 per cent of all adults are infected with the disease. He spent five months assisting nurses doing home visits to HIV and AIDS patients and helping with research projects for the centre.

Moved by his experiences working with the AIDS patients, he sought ways to help them from his home in Canada. He brought back a bag of Little Travellers – tiny beaded dolls created by women with AIDS living in the area to try to raise some money to support themselves.

After returning home for his first year of medical school, Schwartz established the Little Travellers HIV/AIDS Initiative in Winnipeg, a group of volunteers dedicated to raising money for and awareness of the disease. With the help of a core group of a dozen or so supporters, Schwartz raises funds through the sale of Little Travellers for the South African craftswomen.

To date, he reports, he and his group of volunteers have raised more than $300,000. All proceeds go back to South Africa, with more than half of the selling price supporting a newly established respite centre at the Hillcrest AIDS Centre. The remaining funds pay the women who carefully craft and bead the colourful dolls.

"The money we raise provides the crafters with a steady income year round in an area where the unemployment rate is about 40 per cent," he says. "It has had a positive effect on their lives. They have been able to pay for school fees for their kids and add to their household furnishings. Equally as important, the income has given them a sense of confidence which has encouraged them to share their experiences with HIV with others."

There are several varieties of Little Travellers to choose from and the craftswomen are continually coming out with new designs. For example, you can order a mermaid doll, a mother holding a baby, a doll carrying wood on her head, one wearing a hat and one with a handbag.

"We encourage innovation by giving the creators of new designs full ownership of their designs," Schwartz says.

He was most recently back in South Africa for a few days in May on his way to do an elective at a pediatric HIV clinic in Malawi, a small country wedged between Zimbabwe and Mozambique, where 12 per cent of the population is infected with HIV.

He has two more years to go in his residency in infectious diseases in Kingston.

The dolls are available online at www.littletravellers.net.

Winnipeg Beach shul undergoes expansion

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The small synagogue at the Winnipeg Beach is undergoing an expansion which will see it virtually doubled in size.

"We average about 25 people on Shabbat," Abe Borzykowski, a member of the synagogue's management committee, said last month. "Our capacity was about 35. When we finish our expansion, we will be able to squeeze a few more people in."

The construction work was being done entirely by volunteer labour, Borzykowski said. The only cost was for materials.

The object of the 16-by-18 foot addition, he said, was to have a separate room for kiddushes after Saturday services. The one-room sanctuary had doubled as the dining area for kiddushes. There was a fridge and a table at the rear that were to be moved to the new space, thus freeing a little more room for daveners.

The Hebrew Congregation of Winnipeg Beach is the last functioning synagogue in Manitoba outside of Winnipeg.

Winnipeg Beach – located on the southwest shore of Lake Winnipeg, about a 45-minute drive from the Manitoba capital – and the resort town of Gimli, a 10-minute drive farther north, have long been the summer resorts of choice for Winnipeg's Jewish community. In 1950, a group of Jewish summer residents established the shul. They bought a one-room log cabin and moved it to a location at Winnipeg Beach.

The shul has always been a summer-only institution. For years, there used to be twice-daily minyans, in addition to Shabbat services, throughout the summer. Now, the shul only has services on Shabbat through July and August.

For many years, Shabbat services were led by Rabbi Peretz Weizman, Winnipeg's senior rabbi, who used to have a cottage at Winnipeg Beach. It has been a number of years since Rabbi Weizman sold his cottage. (He moved to Toronto permanently last December.) Services today are led by volunteers, and Borzykowski said there are no membership dues.

In 1998, the congregation moved the synagogue a little farther north to the site of Camp Massad. Winnipeg Beach had passed a bylaw requiring all buildings to have indoor plumbing, a requirement that the synagogue's management committee felt would have been too costly to comply with.

The congregation became egalitarian in 2007.

Borzykowski said work began on the expansion in early June (with volunteers putting in time on Sundays). The work was expected to be completed in time for an official opening and 60th anniversary celebration on July 3.

Montreal shul adopts Koren Sacks siddur

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Shaare Zedek Congregation, a "traditional" Conservative synagogue, has become the first congregation of any denomination in Montreal to completely change over to the Koren Sacks Siddur, whose appearance is shaking up the English-language Jewish text publishing world.

The new prayerbook from Israel, with modern English translation, functional design and introduction and commentary by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, the United Kingdom's erudite chief rabbi, is aimed primarily at the modern Orthodox.

Koren Publishers, based in Jerusalem, is going head-to-head with Mesorah Publications of Brooklyn, N.Y., whose ArtScroll Siddur has dominated the market since it was first published in 1984. There's hardly a mainstream Orthodox synagogue in North America that doesn't use it.

Shaare Zedek's Rabbi Alan Bright, who persuaded his congregants that the Koren Sacks was best for them, said the decision doesn't mean that the congregation is becoming Orthodox.

"This is not a theological shift. Rather it solidifies where we have been for many years," said Rabbi Bright, who has led Shaare Zedek since 2000. "The only difference between our services and those at any modern Orthodox synagogue is that we have mixed seating."

But he concedes there was and continues to be some opposition. "There's no question there were a few raised eyebrows and some people are bent out of shape, but I hope as soon as they start using it, they will realize this is a unique volume," he said.

Shaare Zedek joins more than 100 congregations, mainly in the United States, in adopting the siddur since its launch in May 2009. One notable Canadian synagogue is the modern Orthodox Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto.

Shaare Zedek left the United Synagogue, the umbrella organization of Conservative congregations almost two years ago and now bills itself as "a traditional Conservative synagogue with a young modern flavour."

Shaare Zedek had been using the Silverman Siddur, which was the standard in the Conservative movement from the 1950s and is now out of print.

It didn't adopt the more recent Sim Shalom Siddur, used by many Conservative shuls today, for practical and ideological reasons. First, it comes in two volumes, and second, Rabbi Bright, who is Orthodox, could not accept its references to "matriarchs" on par with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and other "politically correct" gender neutrality.

After looking at a number of options, including the close second, the Authorized Daily Prayerbook used in his native Britain, Rabbi Bright became convinced that Koren Sacks was the right one for several reasons. The English translation reads well, Rabbi Sacks' input is inspiring and its single volume comprises the entire prayer cycle for the year, including Shabbat, weekdays and holidays, as well as Torah readings and daily laws.

Equally important, this siddur explicitly recognizes and celebrates the State of Israel. There are prayers for its government and soldiers, as well as Yom Ha'atzmaut and Yom Yerushalayim.

The customized Shaare Zedek edition also includes a prayer for our government and, at Rabbi Bright's insistence, a prayer for the safety of Canadian forces.

Of interest to women are prayers for after giving birth and for a newborn, which ArtScroll does not contain.

In June, Shaare Zedek took delivery of 1,000 volumes, replacing all of its prayerbooks. The congregation, located in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, has about 1,300 individual members.

Ballerina turns to MARTIAL ARTS after surviving attack

By MICHELLE BITRAN
Special to The CJN

When Avital Zeisler was in her late teens, she used the Israeli self-defence and combat system of krav maga to save her life. Since that day, she's been determined to teach others the skills they need to protect themselves in dangerous situations.

Zeisler had only completed an introductory course in krav maga when she was unexpectedly attacked by her then-boyfriend.

She thanks her father for enrolling her in the course that gave her the skills to defend herself.

"If I didn't have my training or the knowledge that I had at the time, even though it was minimal, I think I would, God forbid, be dead or in the hospital for sure," she said.

Surviving the attack was a turning point for Zeisler. She began training rigorously in krav maga, going to Israel to learn from the pioneers of the system, and, eventually, she became an instructor herself.

Krav maga translates from Hebrew as "contact combat." It specializes in close-quarters fighting, and it is the preferred self-defence method of the Israel Defence Forces. For Zeisler, it is not just the ultimate street safety system, but also a way to achieve mental and physical strength.

"I've found that, for me, continuing to train in martial arts and krav allowed me to move on from that traumatic experience in a positive and productive way," said Zeisler.

Now, at only 21 years old, she is the only woman in the world to have passed the full instructorship certification program in Israel with the Israeli Krav Maga Association. The IKMA was founded in 1978 by the combat system's creator, Imi Lichtenfeld, and is recognized by the Israeli government as the authority on krav maga.

Zeisler's high-level certification, the product of more than five years of intensive training, has given her the opportunity to work with military and self-defence specialists around the world. Last month, she travelled to New Jersey to train with the martial arts expert of the U.S. Marine Corps.

Before that, she worked with renowned American safety and self-defence consultant Steve Kardian to improve her self-defence techniques and to learn more about personal safety.

"I consult with people, I really get involved, I want to know as much as I can about the issue," said Zeisler of civilian self-defence.

She said that krav maga's instinct-based strategies provide the most effective form of real-life self-defence.

"I really think that everyone can benefit from training in krav and self-defence because it really does change your mental state. It makes you tougher and stronger."

Over the last year, Zeisler has been visiting high schools to teach students about self-defence. She began with motivational speaking for girls about dating safety and women's self-defence and, now, she includes sessions of krav maga training and combat fitness for both boys and girls.

"If I can prevent one girl from going through what I went through, I feel like I've made a difference," she said. According to Zeisler, the feedback from students, teachers and parents has been "phenomenal."

She is currently working to have the York Region District School Board include krav maga and street self-defence as a mandatory part of the high school physical education curriculum.

When Zeisler is not training and teaching, she is a full-time student at the Schulich School of Business in Toronto. It is her love of business and her passion for self-defence that led her to creating her own company, Soteria Athletics Group.

Soteria, named for the Greek goddess of safety, provides "corporate wellness and corporate safety" instruction for the employees of businesses. Whether it's through lessons in krav maga, combat fitness or nutritional counselling, Zeisler and her team of certified trainers and nutritionists help companies achieve a safer and healthier work environment.

According to Zeisler, corporate wellness is not just about physical safety and well-being, but "it's also a way of training [employees] mentally to be tougher and stronger in business and to be able to take on more tasks themselves."

When Zeisler looks back, she never would have imagined becoming the krav maga expert that she is today. Before she started training in the martial arts, Zeisler was a ballerina, studying for two years at Canada's National Ballet School, which, she says, comes as a shock to many of her students.

Avital Zeisler, 21, a krav maga expert, visits high schools to talk about the importance of self-defence.
[Virgil Knaap photo]

Zeisler credits her dance experience with allowing her to pick up martial arts combinations with ease.

"It's made me aware of my body, of my movement, my co-ordination," she said.

Zeisler still sees herself as a student, eager to learn as much as she can about krav maga. This summer, she's travelling to Israel to participate in an instructors' workshop with the IKMA.

When she returns, Zeisler has big plans. "The goal is to teach as many corporations as possible, to reach as many students as possible. Maybe work on a set of self-defence DVDs, even write a book," she said.

Zeisler is living by example when it comes to the message she has for her students.

"No matter what happens in your life, whether it is awful or tragic, you can move on from it in a positive way, in a meaningful way," she said.

CHAT grads go for gold

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Getting the gold level Duke of Edinburgh award isn't an easy feat.

For Alexandra Wolfond, 19, it meant volunteering in an orphanage in Thailand, visiting Holocaust memorial sites on the March of the Living in Poland, learning to play field hockey and spending a day rappelling off walls with the Canadian army in Alberta.

Wolfond, who is going into her second year at McGill for a bachelors of education, was one of six graduates from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto to receive the gold level Duke of Edinburgh Award.

Alexandra Wolfond, 19, spent the day with Canadian troops while aiming for the Duke of Edinburgh gold award.

The award, which was founded in the UK in 1956, challenges youth aged 14 to 25 to engage in personal growth through four categories – community service, skills, physical recreation and adventurous journey.

The award has three levels, bronze, silver and gold. In order to attain a gold award, which takes around 18 months, youth must do a minimum of 90 hours of community service, participate in an adventurous journey, learn new skills, engage in a physical activity and complete a residential project, which requires youth to be away from home for at least five days and four nights.

"You have to be motivated," Wolfond said of completing the award. "When I set my mind on something, I stay focused."

For Wolfond, who realized she wanted to be a teacher while volunteering at orphanages in Thailand, Morocco, Indonesia, China and Vietnam, the award process was about more than just a certificate.

"I really enjoyed the community service aspect in Thailand. I enjoyed it all," she said. "I've gotten my swim instructor [certificate], my life guarding [certificate]...I went for a soldier for a day trip...it just really opened my eyes."

To Paul Shaviv, the director of education at TanenbaumCHAT, this is what the award is about.

"It's the most internationally recognized youth award in the world," Shaviv said.

"It's a way to encourage children to live a very full life."

Those who achieve a gold award receive a pin, which TanenbaumCHAT students got during their graduation ceremony, and must receive a certificate from either a member of the royal family or the governor general. Wolfond, along with fellow gold winner Ben Deverett, were chosen randomly to accept a certificate from the Duke of Edinburgh during a royal visit on July 5 at an award ceremony.

The other four winners from TanenbaumCHAT were Russell Citron, Lucie Pivnick, Sarah Silverberg and Shira Strauss, most of whom received their awards after graduating in 2009.

For Pivnick, also a McGill student now going into her second year, the award process was part of the reason that her summer will be spent volunteering with children in Israel and Ethiopia, where she'll be working with Right to Play, a group that helps bring sports to disadvantaged communities worldwide.

Pivnick, 19, received her gold award in 2009 after spending 18 months learning to play the saxophone, going on the March of the Living and collecting and distributing pens and pencils to schools in Africa.

"It's my nature to be interested in [volunteer work] but the award re-instilled the importance of it to me," she said in a phone interview from Israel, where she volunteered with Save a Child's Heart, an organization that brings kids to Israel for free heart surgery.

"[The award process] was challenging at times. It's hard," Pivnick said. "I guess it just taught me to push my boundaries and step outside my comfort zone and just to take risks."

Greater Toronto Area

Residents take issue with Bathurst Manor Plaza plans

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Local residents expressed serious concerns about the proposed plans for redeveloping Bathurst Manor Plaza at a community consultation meeting last week, including the condition of the plaza in the interim, and whether aging infrastructure such as schools, roads and water services in the area could handle an increase in population density.

The new proposal – a revised version of the one discussed at an initial meeting in 2006 – was presented to more than 350 people at the June 29 meeting at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, about half a kilometre south of the plaza, which is on the northeast corner of Wilmington Avenue and Overbrook Place.

The plan, if approved, would replace retail shops and medical offices in the plaza with two mixed-use condominium buildings with ground-floor retail and service outlets, as well as 44 townhouses. Parking – 542 spaces in all – would be available below and above ground.

Unlike the original plan, the new one would incorporate a private road, a network of pedestrian walks and 20,000 square feet of commercial/retail space compared to the 10,000 proposed initially.

As well – surprisingly, given the initial objection to an increase in population density – the number of proposed residential units has more than doubled from approximately 150 to almost 400.

Current existing retail space is significantly larger, at approximately 90,000 square feet, than what is proposed, but the decision was also affected by the proliferation of big-box stores on nearby Dufferin Street, according to Andrew Bigauskas, the project architect.

The proposed retail space would have to be "a smaller type of space that still will attract walk-in traffic," said lawyer Adam Brown on behalf of plaza owner Kilbarry Holding Corporation. "Some of the vehicular traffic is going to larger places," he noted.

The plan is not "a final deal," said Debbie Gilbert, speaking on behalf of the volunteer working group established after the 2006 meeting to facilitate community input.

Councillor Michael Feldman added, "This is far from the final application, far from the final meeting."

The applicant will have to determine how to address the concerns, said City of Toronto planner Cassidy Ritz.

The existing site is not zoned for residential use, she noted, but city planning was "about the car" when the plaza was built in the 1950s. "We want to get people walking and cycling," she said.

The city of Toronto is "a growing entity," said Neil Cresswell, manager of community planning in the city's north district. "You're probably not going to like this. What you have to understand is where the community is right now in terms of growth and development...What is happening in this community is what's happened elsewhere around the city of Toronto."

But, he noted later in the evening, "nothing is going to get approved in the short term."

Minutes of the meeting and revised reports, when they become available, were to be posted online at www.toronto.ca/planning/bathurstmanor.htm.

To offer input on the plans, contact Cassidy Ritz at 416-395-7053 or critz@toronto.ca.

Spice of Life

Florida-style summer dinner

By RANDY FINGRUT
Special to The CJN

Florida's cuisine is without question a unique blend of the most diverse cooking styles of the world. The rich exchange of multicultural cooking and variety of foods began with a liaison between native American, Spanish and European ingredients and cooking methods. Florida's cuisine has been further influenced by Anglo-American and Jewish flavours, as well as by Cuban and Caribbean heat. All this history is accented by a myriad of locally grown foods, resulting in a fascinating fusion of dishes to suit any taste.

With such a great blend of cultures and a wealth of interesting ingredients at our fingertips, a Florida-style menu is a terrific start to enhance any summer gathering.

FLORIDA BEACH BREAD

This popular new South Florida appetizer is somewhat like a cross between garlic bread and a sauceless pizza. Make a big batch, as it is quite addictive!

1 large loaf of french bread
2 tbsp. butter or margarine
1 tsp. garlic powder
1/3 cup ranch dressing
1 large tomato, seeded and diced
2 tbsp. fresh chives, chopped
2 cups Mozzarella cheese, shredded

Preheat broiler to high.

Slice the bread in half lengthwise and place on a baking sheet. Butter the inside surface of the bread. Sprinkle with garlic powder and broil until slightly toasted.

Remove and spread dressing over both pieces. Top with diced tomatoes, fresh chives and cheese.

Broil until cheese melts and is beginning to turn brown. Cool slightly, and slice into appetizer sized portions. Serve immediately.

SOUTH BEACH SALAD

2 1/2 tbsp. white balsamic vinegar
2 tsp. fresh lime juice
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1/2 cup cilantro, chopped
1 ripe avocado
salt and pepper to taste
lettuce, grape tomatoes, red onion…

Mash the avocado with lime juice; add oil, vinegar and cilantro, season with salt and pepper. Stir until smooth.

Toss with vegetables before serving.

CRISPY LIME SOLE WITH TROPICAL FRUIT SALSA

1/3 cup flour
2 cups crisp rice cereal, crushed
1/2 cup blanched sliced almonds, finely chopped
1/4 cup blanched sliced almonds
1 tbsp. fresh cilantro, chopped
1 egg, beaten
1 tbsp. lime zest
3 tbsp. fresh key lime juice or fresh lime juice
1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. lemon pepper
1/4 tsp. garlic powder
1 lb. fresh sole fillets
canola oil spray

Use one flat dish for flour, and a second flat dish for the cereal crumbs, 1/2 cup almonds and cilantro. In a wide bowl, mix together eggs with 2 tbsp. lime juice, seasonings and lime zest. Dip both sides of the fish first into the flour, then into the egg mixture, draining slightly, then into the crumb mixture, coating well.

Place on a baking sheet sprayed with canola oil. Drizzle

Key Lime tarts

breaded sole with remaining lime juice. Bake at 400 for 15-20 minutes, or until fish flakes. Garnish with remaining almond slices. Serve topped with Tropical Fruit Salsa

TROPICAL FRUIT SALSA

Habanero chili peppers are a favourite in Florida cuisine. They are extremely hot and flavourful. If you can't find one in your local market, substitute a fresh Jalapeno pepper or hot chili sauce.

1 orange or 2 clementines, peeled and diced
1 mango, peeled and diced
1 pear, peeled and diced
1 tbsp. fresh cilantro, chopped
1/2 tsp. sugar
1 tbsp. fresh chives, finely chopped
1 tbsp. fresh lime juice
Optional – 1/4 tsp. (or to taste) fresh habanero chili pepper, seeds removed and finely chopped (take care handling chili) or 1/2 tsp. (or to taste), chili hot sauce

In a medium bowl combine all ingredients and mix well. Cover and refrigerate. Salsa needs 4-5 hours for the flavours to merge, so prepare it in advance.

MINI KEY LIME TARTS

1 package frozen tart shells (12 regular or 18 mini-shells)
4 egg yolks
14-oz. can sweetened low-fat condensed milk
2 tsp. lime zest, finely grated
1/2 cup key lime juice, or fresh lime juice

Place tart shells on a baking sheet and bake at 350 for 8-10 minutes, or until edges start to turn golden. Cool slightly. In processor or with an electric mixer, beat egg yolks until they are light yellow, add condensed milk and pulse, or mix on low. Add lime zest and 1/2 of the lime juice, pulse, or mix on low until incorporated. Add remaining juice and repeat. Spoon mixture into shells, bake at 350 for 12 minutes. Refrigerate until ready to serve.

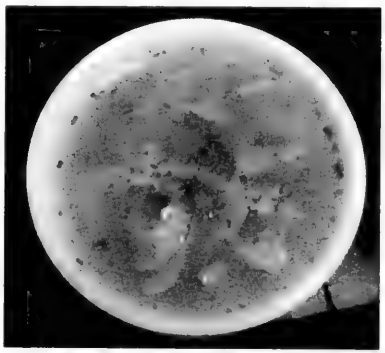
Chicken soup never goes out of style

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There are two types of cooks – those who scramble through recipes and old notes trying to recreate the meals of their childhood and serve the same traditional dishes each year, and those who want their meal to be modern and sophisticated. They watch food shows on television and browse through gourmet cookbooks for inspiration.

But whichever type of cook you are, there is one indisputable dish that will be on almost everyone's menu year after year – chicken soup with matzah balls – like your bubbie made.



BUBBIE'S MATZAH BALL SOUP

When buying chicken to make soup, it's preferable to use large chickens because they are meatier.

4-5 lb. chicken and bones cut into eight pieces
1 or more turkey necks
16 cups water
1 large onion peeled and cut in half
2 stalks of celery, cut in 1/2-in. pieces
1 small parsnip root, peeled
1 small celery root, peeled and cut into quarters
3 large carrots, peeled and cut into 1/4- to 1/2-in. rounds
5 garlic cloves
1 tbsp. paprika
1/2 bunch fresh parsley
1/2 bunch fresh dill
2 bay leaves
salt and pepper

Wash the chicken pieces and turkey neck and place in a large stockpot. Add all vegetables and top with water. Add remaining ingredients. Bring to a simmer and skim. Let simmer, half covered, for about 2 hours. For best results and a clear, flavourful broth, do not let the soup boil at any time. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Serves 8-10.

Tips for serving: Cool before refrigerating. Before reheating, skim all the fat from the top and discard. The soup can be served with or without the vegetables. I like to pass the vegetables and necks separately and let guests serve themselves.

MATZAH BALLS

If you end up with leftover matzah balls, they're delicious sautéed in oil with browned onions and served as a side dish.

1 cup water
1/2 cup margarine or vegetable oil
1 cup matzah meal
3 eggs
1/4 cup chopped fresh parsley
1/2 tsp. kosher salt
pinch of white pepper

In a saucepan bring water and margarine to a boil. While still on the flame, carefully add matzah meal and salt and mix together to make a paste (about 1 minute). Cool to a temperature comfortable to the touch. Add the eggs one by one (if the mixture is too hot, the eggs will coagulate), mixing after each addition until eggs are completely dissolved into the mix (this step can be done by electric mixer).

Bring a large pot with salted water to a boil.

With wet hands, shape the mixture into balls and drop into boiling water. Make the balls smaller than desired since they will almost double in size while cooking.

Boil for about 45-50 minutes until the balls float. Remove with a slotted spoon. Makes about 24.

MUSHROOM PÂTÉ

Serve as an appetizer

1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1/4 cup chopped onion
1 oz. dried porcini mushrooms
1/4 cup kosher dry red wine
1 lb. mixed wild mushrooms such as oyster, cremini and shiitake
1/2 tsp. salt, or to taste
1/2 tsp. pepper, or to taste
2 tbsp. lemon juice

Combine vegetable oil and onion in a wide skillet. Cook over medium heat until translucent, about 5 minutes. Combine dried mushrooms with 2 tablespoons of hot water and red wine. Allow them to soak a few minutes until soft, then drain and chop the mushrooms, reserving the soaking liquid.

Chop the fresh mushrooms. Add to onions. Add porcini. Cook on high heat for 2 to 3 minutes. Add reserved water/wine mixture. Cook another minute or so.

If blend is too dry, add a little more wine. Purée in a blender. Then add salt, pepper and lemon juice. Makes about 1 cup.

Tu b'Av, the holiday of love

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

Tu b'Av, the 15th of the Hebrew month of Av, one week after Tisha b'Av, was a festival in ancient times dedicated to young Jewish men and women finding their mates and was celebrated as a holiday of love.

According to the Talmud, during the time of the First Temple, Tu b'Av was the day on which one could hunt for a mate. The eligible single girls of Jerusalem borrowed white dresses, so as to not embarrass those who possessed none of their own. Then they would go out and dance in the vineyards so they would be chosen as brides by eligible young men.

Tu b'Av also marked the beginning of the grape harvest and Yom Kippur marked the end.

Among the reasons why Tu b'Av existed, as listed in the Talmud, is the fact that on this day the members of the 12 tribes were allowed to intermarry. Another reason was that in ancient Israel, the tribe of Binyamin had fought other tribes and was not permitted to marry from other tribes. On this day, the Benjaminites were re-admitted into the community and marriages could take place. In fact, 200 males from the tribe of Binyamin were married to women of one of the tribes that was about to become extinct. The soon-to-be brides danced in the vineyards of the capital of Israel, which was then Shilo, a town 40 minutes north of Jerusalem.

Today, in the same vineyards, Jewish girls from Shiloh dance in special programs, and there are reenactments of biblical stories, workshops and more.

In modern-day Israel, people send red roses to the one they love on Tu b'Av, romantic songs are played on the radio, and the holiday is celebrated with parties in the evenings. Some think of the day as a holiday devoted to singles, about getting on with life and love. More weddings than normal are registered on this day in rabbinate offices, and many have their marriage ceremonies on this day. A few years ago, there was even held a rock concert with attendees sleeping on the beach on Tu b'Av.

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

מה יהיה

ישראל של יוני 2010, לאחר פרשת המשט שגרמה לסערה בינלאומית- פתאום מרכך נתניהו את המצור על עזה וטוען שאת המצור יצר בעצם ברק בממשלה הקודמת. כלומר: יש צדק בדברי אלה שטענו שהמצור מוזנח ואין לו ולא כלום עם המצב הבטחוני עם הכנסת נשק לעזה. כל מה שעושה נתניהו הוא ריאקטיבי, תגובתי, ולא פרואקטיבי-אין שום לקיחת יוזמה. החלל הבוטה של חוסר מנהיגות, של חוסר כוון מדיני, צועק ממאמרי המערכת בכל העיתונים הישראלים.

זה לא טוב, זה רע לתפארת. כל מה שמעניין את נתניהו זה כסאו, ועל כן לא יעשה שום צעד שירגיז את ליברמן. והרי יודע כל ילד בתיכון שיכול היה נתניהו להחליף ברגע את ליברמן בצימי לבני ר"קדימה", לו רצה באמת להזיז את הקפאון המדיני.

אבל שישאר בינינו.

על אבשים וזרקורים-הורים פידרנקי

כמעט כל אחד חולם לעמוד באור זרקורים ואני לא מתכוון לזרקורי תיאטרון, או במה. הכוונה לאלומות אור בלתי נראות אשר הופכות אלמונים אפורים לאנשים מפורסמים וידועים. המטרה מקדשת את האמצעים וכדי להיות מפורסמים לא רק בגת או בחוצות אשקלון, יש כאלה אשר לא בוחלים באמצעים ומוכנים למכור תמורת פרסום מפוקפק את ההורים, האחים, החברים, האומה ובעיקר את עצמם.

הקדמה ארוכה ומעייפת זו כתבתי אחרי שקראתי ראיון ארוך ולא משעמם, אשר הופיע על עמוד שלם ב "שלום-טורונטו". ראיון אשר נערך ללוחרות ישראלית מקריית-גת. אלמונית לשעבר אשר כדי להתפרסם ולהגיע לכותרות , הסכה להיות שונאת ישראל ארוזה בעטיפה של שנאה לציונות ולעם הכובש היושב בציון. יחד עם כל המטען החליטה להיאבק בדיכוי אחיה צאצאי ישמעאל. כך, למען מטרה נעלה זאת, התקרבה לקבוצת מחבלים החברים באחד ה"ג'יהדים בע"מ", "לוחמי-חופש" אמיצים ללא חת, אשר שולחים גיבורים חלולי מח לפוצץ עצמם במקומות ציבוריים. בין היתר הפכה הצדקת לידידה אישית למבוקש מוביל בגדה המערבית. בחור יפה נפש אשר שומר על נקיון כפיו אותן הוא נוטל בדמם של חפים מפשע. ידידות זו זיכתה את חסידת האומות בשנות מאסר בכלא ישראלי, משם יצאה ישר לאויר הצח של תל-אביב כדי לספר לאומות העולם כמה גזענית מדינת ישראל, כמה אכזרים קלגסיה אשר לא בוחלים באמצעים כדי לדכא את התמימים והכבושים.

אם עדיין לא ניחשתם, לאלמונית לשעבר מקריית-גת קוראים סלי פחימה. בחורה בישנית, צנועה ויפת נפש, אשר עד לפני כמה שנים אפילו בשכונת ילדותה בודדים ידעו מי זו סלי או פחימה. היום בזכות עיתונאים, כתבי טלויזיה ואמצעי תקשורת אחרים, אשר התחרו ביניהם מי יביא את הגברת לעמודים הראשיים כדי למכור יותר עתונים, הסכה הטלי (אשר גם התאסלמה בינתיים לצורך הענין), עם כיסוי ראש ולבוש מבית היוצר של אומנת פקיסטאן, להיות סלבריטאית ידועה לא פחות מהכוכבים אשר נולדו אצל צביקה הדר. אם היו בטורונטו ישראלים אשר לא היה להם מושג מי הצדקת, הרי היום היא מוכרת בזכות הראיון בעתון המקומי. עם כל הכבוד לעיתונאי, שאני מאוד מעריך, אני לא חושב שלגברת מקרית-גת מגיע הזרקור שנדלק עבורה על עמוד שלם בעיתון הישראלי. למרות שגם אני מזכיר בכתבתי את אותה אלמונית לשעבר, ומאיר עליה, אם לא בזרקור לפחות במנס כיס, עדיף שיצורים כמוה יזכו לאור זרקור העומד על שולחן פסיכאטר

או מומחה לרפואת נפש ולא אמצעי תקשורת צמאים לתמצה ורייטינג.

על זכויות החרדים

התכוונתי לכתוב כתבה שלמה על הנושא, אבל כותרת ב"ידיעות אחרונות" אומרת את הכל- וכל מילה נוספת מיותרת:

"האפלייה הזו נמשכת שנים: המדינה משלמת גמלת הבטחת הכנסה לאלפי חרדים, אבל לא לסטודנטים שהשתחררו ברובם מצה"ל. בג"ץ פסק: זה לא שוויוני. בישיבות החרדיות הגיבו בזעם: מה הם רוצים, שנלך לעבוד!".

Obama, Netanyahu to focus on move to direct talks

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — Proximity talks between the Israelis and Palestinians have addressed "core issues," and President Barack Obama is ready to move to direct talks, White House officials said

Ben Rhodes and Daniel Shapiro, two senior staffers on the White House national security council, spoke with reporters last Friday afternoon ahead of a summit scheduled to take place Tuesday between Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Israel and the United States have been pressing the Palestinians to advance to direct talks. One Palestinian condition has been a sign from Israel that it is ready to deal with "core issues," including borders, Jerusalem and refugees. Shapiro suggested the talks had reached that point.

"We've engaged with both sides on all the core issues that are relevant to this conflict," he said. "And we've always viewed the proximity talks as a mechanism to get to direct talks, which is where the real negotiations toward agreements and ultimately an agreement that will produce a two-state solution can be achieved."

Shapiro said transitioning to direct talks would be the main focus of the meeting between Netanyahu and Obama. The officials did not want to set a timeline, but suggested that Obama wanted talks underway before September, when two deadlines lapse: Netanyahu's self-imposed, partial 10-month settlement freeze ends, and it is the date by which the Arab League wants to see the launch of a total settlement freeze as a condition for its continued support of the process.

"We are, of course, fully aware of a number of events that are taking place in September, whether it's a meeting of the Arab League or the UN General Assembly or the West Bank settlement moratorium," Rhodes said. "But again, our focus is on building what really has been some momentum in a number of areas."

Isolating Iran until it makes its nuclear program more transparent will also be on the Netanyahu-Obama agenda.

The two leaders meet after months of tension precipitated in March when Israel announced new building in eastern Jerusalem during U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's visit to Israel.

Shapiro and Rhodes denied talk of a rift. Shapiro described the "incredible richness and intensity and quality of the exchange between our governments in military channels, in political channels, in intelligence channels.

"That kind of co-operation characterizes a spirit of partnership and strategic alliance that, as Ben said, is extremely important to the United States and our interests and, of course, our values," Shapiro said.

In related developments, Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas reportedly offered to have the Western Wall and Jerusalem's Jewish Quarter remain under Israel's control as part of a peace settlement, according to an Arabic newspaper.

Abbas made the offer as part of a written proposal to U.S. Mideast negotiator George Mitchell, the London-based Al-Hayat reported over the weekend.

The proposal reportedly also included the forming of an independent Palestinian state on land along the 1967 borders with land swaps of about 2.3 per cent in order to encompass some West Bank settlement blocs. The rest of the Old City would be the capital of the Palestinian state but open to all faiths, according to the report.

Chief PA negotiator Saeb Erekat said Sunday in an interview with Israel Radio that Abbas did not make such an offer.

Israel concerned about natural gas delivery

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — More than a year after a massive natural gas find in the Mediterranean Sea off the Israeli coast sparked hopes in Israel of a new era of energy independence, the project is running into concerns about how the gas can be delivered safely.

The BP spill in the Gulf of Mexico has raised concerns in Israel about processing the gas and its delivery within the country.

"You don't just open the valve and everyone's happy," said Zeev Aizenshtat, a fossil fuels expert who works as a chemistry professor at Jerusalem's Hebrew University. "In a country that has security problems, especially with the imminent threat of missiles coming in, you need to make sure the pipes are well protected."

The question is how to bring the gas, which was discovered in February 2009 one mile below the sea floor approximately 50 miles off the Haifa coast, to Israel, and then how to distribute it throughout the country. Natural gas is highly flammable, and Israel also lacks the infrastructure of piping needed to distribute the gas nationwide.

If Israel finds a way to deliver it safely and efficiently, the treasure-trove of some 24 trillion cubic feet of natural gas could be Israel's ticket to energy independence, providing the country with some 70 per cent of its energy needs for the next 20 years, according to experts.

The trove is a combination of two major gas fields – called Leviathan and Tamar, named for the granddaughter of Israeli energy mogul Yitzhak Tshuva. It was Tshuva's Delek Group and a U.S. partner that were responsible for the drilling that led to the finds.

Israel's energy needs are now provided mostly by coal. Israel imports natural gas from Egypt via a pipeline, and it imports coal and oil from countries around the globe, including Russia, Mexico and Norway.

> 'This discovery is ... a geopolitical game changer'

"This discovery is nothing short of a geopolitical game changer," Gal Luft, executive director of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security, a Washington-based NGO that deals with energy and security issues, wrote earlier this month in the Ha'aretz newspaper.

But several challenges come first. Lebanon claims it has rights to the Leviathan find. The Lebanese say the northern part of the find is in their territorial waters. Israel dismisses the claim, saying it is firmly within its own maritime boundaries.

"We will not hesitate to use our force and strength to protect not only the rule of law but the international maritime law," Minister of National Infrastructure Uzi Landau told the Bloomberg news agency last week, responding to the Lebanese claims.

Then there is the question of how to deliver the gas and avoid accidents such as the BP spill especially if, as is now being considered, Israel builds a natural gas processing plant in the sea rather than on land.

The underwater plant has two potential benefits. It could offer the processing plant additional protection from attack by terrorists or enemy aircraft, and it could circumvent the not-in-my-backyard syndrome that stands as an obstacle to the construction of a processing plant near Israeli population centres along the coast. Local opponents already have emerged against each of six potential sites for the plant on land.

Israelis are concerned that the gas power plants could become military targets or turn into fireballs, said Amit Bracha, executive director of the advocacy group Adam Teva V'Din, the Israeli Union for Environmental Defense.

"The not-in-my-backyard syndrome takes on new meaning in Israel, which is so small," Bracha said.

Adam Teva V'Din supports the alternative option of establishing the plant underwater.

"No one can bomb it," Bracha said, "and it's safer because it's not near any neighbourhoods."

But safety concerns attend to that option, too.

A spill in the water would cause serious environmental damage, albeit less than a toxic oil spill. Even on land, Israel would have to build a network of pipes that would be secure and able to shut down automatically if there is a leak.

The government is conducting a survey to determine the best option for constructing the natural gas processing plant. In any case, the gas itself won't be tapped until 2012 because it takes time to set up a distribution infrastructure.

In a statement to JTA, the National Infrastructure Ministry wrote that even if a decision is made to build an underwater plant, it does not preclude the possibility that one might also be built on land.

Aizenshtat said the natural gas find could help Israel achieve newfound independence.

"We were promised a land of milk and honey by God, but nothing was ever said about petroleum," he said. "But the moment you do have it, people start looking at you differently.

"Energy today is a commodity that countries live and die by," he said. "Whoever has control of the faucet can have a strong influence on the world. Politically this find is very important."

Israel Briefs

Israel's limits regarding Schalit

Israel will free 1,000 Palestinian prisoners for the release of Gilad Schalit, but it "will not pay any price," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a live address to the nation.

The address came on the fifth day of a cross-country march by the captured Israeli soldier's family and supporters that has attracted thousands of people. The march ends this week in Jerusalem, where Schalit's parents have vowed to camp out across from the prime minister's official residence until their son is released.

"The German mediator's offer, which we agreed to accept, called for the release of 1,000 terrorists. This is the price I am prepared to pay to bring Gilad home," Netanyahu said.

Netanyahu said he would not be willing to return dangerous terrorists to the West Bank, nor is he willing to release what he termed "top terrorists," worried that they would commit more terror acts after their release.

In response Schalit's father, Noam, said "The prime minister drew horrifying scenarios from 25 years ago and from six years ago about terrorists who were released and then murdered Israelis, as if nothing had changed since then, as if Israel had no security services."

Hamas gunmen abducted Gilad Schalit in a cross-border raid in June 2006. The International Red Cross has not been allowed access to Schalit in his four years of captivity.

Spanish chain removes Rummikub

Israeli media reported that a Spanish toy store chain has removed the Israeli game Rummikub from its shelves. The removal reportedly is in response to Israel's interception on May 31 of a Gaza-bound flotilla that left nine passengers dead.

"We carried the game until now because it is very interesting from a pedagogical perspective," Quim Sicilia, one of the senior managers of the Abacus chain, told the Spanish newspaper. "But as a cooperative we see what is going on, and we must be sensitive to the social situations."

Iran supplied Syria with radar

Iran has supplied Syria with a sophisticated radar system that could provide an early warning of an Israeli attack on its nuclear facilities, The Wall Street Journal reported.

Last Thursday's report, which cites Israeli and U.S. officials, says the new radar also could benefit the Iran-backed Hezbollah, which is based in Lebanon and is believed to receive arms from Syria. If Syria shares its radar information with Hezbollah, it could increase the accuracy of the terrorist organization's own missiles, according to the report.

Farrakhan says Jews hurt blacks

JTA

WASHINGTON — In a letter addressed to U.S. Jewish organizations, Minister Louis Farrakhan accused Jews of hurting blacks and called for dialogue to "repair" the damage.

The Nation of Islam leader sent the letter, as well as a two-volume copy of "The Secret Relationship Between Blacks and Jews," by the Nation of Islam Historical Research Team, which he said proves "an undeniable record of Jewish anti-black behavior," the Associated Press reported Tuesday.

"We could charge you with being the most deceitful so-called friend, while your history with us shows you have been our worst enemy," he reportedly wrote in the letter, dated June 24. In the past, Farrakhan has called Judaism a "gutter religion."

The letter was sent to several Jewish organizations, including the Anti-Defamation League, American Israel Public Affairs Committee, the American Jewish Committee and the Orthodox and Reform movements, according to AP.

Farrakhan called for dialogue with Jewish groups and their supporters.

"This is an offer asking you and the gentiles whom you influence to help me in the repair of my people from the damage that has been done by your ancestors to mine," he wrote in the letter.

Abraham Foxman, ADL's national director, received a copy of the letter and the books.

"Never in our more than 20 years of following Minister Louis Farrakhan, have we seen him so obsessively devoted to his hate crusade against Jews," Foxman said.

"His anti-Semitism is obsessive, diabolical and unrestrained. He has opened a new chapter in his ministry where scapegoating Jews is not just part of a message, but the message.

"Dialogue does not begin with bigoted accusations. Farrakhan's call for dialogue with Jews is so outrageous and disingenuous that you can't believe anyone would take him seriously."

In a news release, the ADL pointed out that Farrakhan, in an address to followers in Atlanta on June 26, announced that he had sent the book to the media and members of the Obama administration.

He also continued to speak negatively about Jews.

"Today the Jewish people have developed a new strategy," Farrakhan said, according to the ADL release. "They have always tied themselves to black people. They attach themselves to our talent. They are the managers, the agents, and they are the accountants, and that's why our black artists loved fame and got fame but died poor because somebody else got their money.

"No black man or woman becomes a multimillionaire without friendship in the Jewish community."

The team will be a strong contender

The players were chosen in January from among the top players in an apprentice coaching program run under the auspices of the Peres Center for Peace. The players were also selected for their personal achievements and contributions to their own communities.

"This is our opportunity to show people that Israelis and Palestinians can play together, and also that we can live together," said the Palestinian coach, Kamal Abu Altom.

He said the language barrier has made communication within the team difficult, but on the field, the team will be a strong contender.

The style of "street soccer" may pose the largest obstacle, Abu Altom added. In regular soccer, which the participants have spent years playing, each team fields 11 players. In this tournament, the eight-person teams will compete in a less-structured environment, without even a referee enforcing discipline and fair play. Any disagreements on the pitch are resolved through dialogue between the players.

All the players are graduates of the Twinned Peace Sports program, a joint Israeli-Palestinian initiative that brings underprivileged children together through sports and peace education.

The program, which today reaches as many as 1,600 young Israelis and Palestinians every year, emerged in 2003 out of a collaboration between the Israeli Peres Center for Peace and the Al-Quds Association for Democracy and Dialogue, a Palestinian non-governmental organization.

The Jewish National Fund in South Africa is actively participating in the team's efforts.

Obama enacts Iran sanctions

JTA

WASHINGTON — President Barack Obama recently signed enhanced Iran sanctions into law.

Representatives of a number of pro-Israel groups, as well as the congressional leadership of both parties, were invited to witness the signing of the sanctions. They target third parties that deal with Iran's energy and finance sectors, as well as human rights abusers.

"For years, the Iranian government has violated its commitments, defied United Nations Security Council resolutions and forged ahead with its nuclear program — all while supporting terrorist groups and suppressing the aspirations of the Iranian people," Obama said.

He placed the sanctions in the context of international efforts to ramp up Iran's isolation until it makes transparent its nuclear program, including new U.N. Security Council resolutions issued last month.

Barack Obama

"Consistent with the Security Council mandate, this legislation strengthens existing sanctions, authorizes new ones and supports our multilateral diplomatic strategy to address Iran's nuclear programs," he said.

"It makes it harder for the Iranian government to purchase refined petroleum and the goods, services and materials to modernize Iran's oil and natural gas sector.

"It makes it harder for the Revolutionary Guards and banks that support Iran's nuclear programs and terrorism to engage in international finance. It says to companies seeking procurement contracts with the United States government [that] if you want to do business with us, you first have to certify that you're not doing prohibited business with Iran."

The sanctions were approved last week in Congress, with overwhelming majorities in both Houses.

N. Zealand Jews plan to fight for shechitah

By DAN GOLDBERG
JTA

SYDNEY, Australia — Barring a last-minute policy reversal, Jewish leaders in New Zealand appear certain to launch legal action against the government over its controversial new law banning kosher slaughter.

Six Jewish leaders were granted a 30-minute meeting a week ago with Prime Minister John Key, the son of a Jewish refugee, to discuss the fallout from the May 27 decision to outlaw kosher slaughter, or shechitah. The meeting in Auckland concluded with the delegation informing Key, who does not practice Judaism, that the small Jewish community would be left with "no option" but to take legal action "if there was no solution forthcoming."

The prime minister "acknowledged that this may be the only course open to us," New Zealand Jewish Council chair Geoff Levy said in a statement.

It now appears likely that Key will face a potentially embarrassing legal showdown that has been described as a test case for shechitah.

The controversy erupted in late May when Agriculture Minister David Carter overruled advice from the National Animal Welfare Advisory Committee to exempt shechitah from a new animal welfare commercial slaughter code. Whereas shechitah previously had been listed as exempt, just as it is under the Humane Slaughter Act in America, Carter decided last month to annul all exemptions.

Under the new code, which was made effective immediately, all commercially killed animals must be stunned before slaughter to "ensure that the animals are treated humanely."

The move shocked the New Zealand Jewish community, which numbers fewer than 7,000. Although kosher meat can be imported from Australia, no chicken is allowed in. Fewer than 100 beef cattle and lambs and several thousand chickens were slaughtered by shechitah annually.

Sydney-based rabbi, Moshe Gutnick, who supervises kosher certification of products in New Zealand, described the ban as "outrageous."

"Hunting is still permitted for deer and ducks, and that is certainly not humane," he said. "The government, using flawed science, institutes a new code and the only people affected by this are the Jews. People are wondering what their real motivation is."

His comments came as the European Parliament voted to mandate that all kosher meat on the continent be labeled "meat from slaughter without stunning" – a move blasted by some Jewish officials as discriminatory.

Meanwhile, the dustup in New Zealand over shechitah has sparked a rift with Australian Jewish leaders over its crisis management strategy.

"I'm terrified they've mismanaged it," a senior Australian Jewish organizational leader said of New Zealand Jewry on condition of anonymity. "They just don't have the expertise."

In a statement, the Executive Council of Australian Jewry said, "They are handling things in their own way and we are closely monitoring the situation. The denial of fundamental rights to kosher consumers in New Zealand has the potential for adverse effects further afield, including Australia."

> 'The risk of other Western democracies following New Zealand's example is real'

Shechitah UK chair Henry Grunwald said his organization, as well as British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, had been asked to assist with religious, legal and scientific advice.

Describing the new code as "an insult," Grunwald wrote in the Jewish Chronicle, "It succumbs to the popular myth that shechitah is painful, ignoring ample evidence to the contrary.

"The risk of other Western democracies following New Zealand's example is real," he warned.

Rabbi Jeremy Lawrence, a former rabbi of the Auckland Hebrew Congregation, told JTA, "The decisions made in New Zealand will have ramifications on how shechitah is viewed the world over. This is a significant test case which is important we do not lose."

Levy said attempts to resolve the crisis were continuing.

"If we can settle the matter politically, so much the better," he said.

A number of legal avenues remained open, he noted. The ban appears to violate New Zealand's Bill of Rights, which protects freedom of religion. It also could be in breach of the Animal Welfare Act, which contains provisions for religious rights, as well as the Human Rights Act, which protects against discrimination.

Carter reportedly apologized to the Jewish community last week for his June 14 speech, in which he said, "We may have upset a relatively small religious minority, and I do appreciate their strong feelings for this issue. But frankly I don't think any animal should suffer in the slaughter process."

Other countries that have banned shechitah include Iceland, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland.

Israeli procedure shrinks fat cells

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The old adage "It hurts to be beautiful" need not apply any more for people wanting to look younger and thinner.

A new innovative procedure for body contouring, skin tightening and wrinkle and cellulite reduction offers people a painless alternative to cosmetic surgery.

The procedure, which utilizes TriPollar radio frequency (RF) technology, was invented by Dr. Zion Azar, an Israeli physicist based in Tel Aviv.

Azar – who has been in the field of aesthetics for more than 30 years – is president of Pollogen Ltd., the company that developed and markets the RF cosmetic technology. He spoke about the use of RF technology in aesthetics in a recent telephone interview.

Azar noted that RF technology, which transmits electrical currents into the skin, has been used in surgery to stop bleeding for about 75 years.

The RF technology doesn't affect the skin's surface, but rather the currents penetrate the inner layers of the skin and treat fat and collagen fibres, he explained.

These currents stimulate the body's natural collagen renewal system, which tightens the skin. They also shrink fat cells, thus reducing the circumference of areas such as the buttocks, thighs and abdomen.

Azar stressed that the TriPollar system isn't painful because the electric currents hit below the surface of the skin. The area has less nerves than the outer skin layer.

He noted that you don't feel any pain, because with TriPollar technology, there are multiple points of contact rather than a single point on the skin surface, which would be more intense and painful.

"The patients in the clinic say that the treatment is very pleasant. You can also see the results immediately after the first treatment."

Azar, who has been a co-partner in the aesthetics industry with fellow physicist Pina Shalev since 1982, started out developing laser technology.

He said laser treatment is not recommended for dark-pigmented skin. "I wanted a treatment method that would be colour blind. Radio frequency technology does not know skin colour. Fat cells are the same for all creeds."

In 2006, he and Shalev developed the TriPollar system, which is now being used in 60 countries worldwide. It has been available in Europe since 2007 and in Canada, Asia and Australia since 2008. This spring, the system will be introduced in the United States.

"We were waiting for the economy to improve before going to the U.S," Azar said.

The TriPollar system is mostly used by plastic surgeons, dermatologists and physicians who take special courses in aesthetics.

The results of TriPollar treatment – the usual course is once a week for six weeks – are not as dramatic as plastic surgery, Azar said.

For younger women in their mid-40s, the TriPollar treatment for wrinkles and sagging skin "can postpone the need for cosmetic surgery. The ideal age is 38 to 45, when you first start to see signs of aging. Depending on the person's skin, he or she can return for maintenance treatment every six months or once every year or two."

Generally, six weeks of treatment can take 10 years off someone's age, Azar said. "A 73-year-old woman cannot expect to look 50 again.

"If you are not willing to go under the knife, this is an effective alternative to plastic surgery."

The procedure for reducing the appearance of cellulite and/ or body circumference also takes six treatments. "You can lose two inches off your tummy or thigh circumference. But if you're going to go to McDonald's every day, it's not going to last."

Azar recommended returning every two or three months to keep up the results. "If your pants are not fitting the same, you'd better come back."

If one is exercising and leading a healthy life, TriPollar treatment is effective. However, he stressed that the treatment is not for obese people.

By targeting certain areas of the body, such as love handles, double chins and saddle bags, the treatment can reduce the size of fat cells.

"We can't change genetics. If your body stores fat in certain places, it means that you are genetically programmed to store fat in those places.

"Men store fat in the tummy area, but they don't have cellulite. But about 80 to 90 per cent of women have cellulite.

"It's a simple fat that changes the structure of the skin. You can see the bumps of fat. They get enlarged and they push the skin upwards. We can't get rid of cellulite."

RF treatment can reduce the appearance of the cellulite, Azar said. "We can change the appearance of cellulite from a Grade 3 to a Grade 1."

However, as women age the cellulite can also change. If you have Grade 5 cellulite, the treatment is not going to help you too much. It can reduce it to a Grade 3 maybe.

"We cannot reduce the cellulite to zero, because we cannot change nature."

Physicians in the GTA using the TriPollar system include Dr. Deborah Fisher (416-929-0373) and Dr. Padma Jain (416-495-8547). To locate other physicians visit www.sigmacon.com.

Experiencing Jewish life of Marrakech

By RUTHIE LADOVSKY
Special to The CJN

If a week of walking 10 hours a day in the High Atlas Mountains is not quite your idea of a wonderful holiday, but you still crave a visit to Morocco, then start and end your trip in the magical city of Marrakech.

Marrakech has changed in the 40 years since I was there last. Or, perhaps I have changed. However, Marrakech is still a place of great beauty, surrounded by the magnificent Atlas Mountains. It's a city of palaces, mosques, beautiful riads (old, majestic houses) and fabulous gardens.

Ruthie Ladovsky in Marrakech

During the day, the city's main square, the Jemaa el Fna, is predominantly occupied by orange juice stalls, youths with chained Barbary apes, water sellers in colourful costumes with traditional leather water bags and brass cups, and snake charmers who will pose for photographs for tourists. The square is edged along one side by the Marrakesh souk (market). From the square, narrow streets lead into the alleys of the medina quarter, the old city. In 1985, the Marrakech medina, which was founded in 1070-72, was selected as a UNESCO World Heritage site.

Marrakech is a city that never sleeps. The call of the muezzin going out from the Koutoubia Mosque five times a day ensures that. It's a city that has always attracted world travellers, and for a very good reason: they return to experience it again and again.

A different city welcomed me this time.

Among the many things I discovered was celebrating erev Shabbat at the Bet El Synagogue.

My Moroccо maven, Epi, had told me that the service would begin at about five minutes past sundown, and that the synagogue is opposite the American English-language school in Gueliz (the name today for the European quarter of Marrakech). Everyone knew where the school, Centre American, is located, but not even the students knew that right across the street from their school is a synagogue. Of course, it's not until you see the mezuzah on the door, and then open the door to the courtyard, that you know that you have arrived!

Some 60 men of all ages filed into the small sanctuary. I joined about 20 women in an even smaller adjacent room. The number of men grew to about 75 within the first 15 minutes. An ornate iron rail with a Magen David in the centre divided the room, allowing us an unobstructed view of the beautiful, hand-carved wooden Aron Kodesh.

As I had observed throughout Marrakech, there are visible displays of affection between men of all ages. Young boys walk arm in arm. Young men warmly greet their friends with hugs and kisses, and older men stroll hand in hand. Each man who entered the synagogue kissed either one of the elders or some other man before taking his seat.

Not being familiar with the liturgical traditions of Moroccan Jewry, I didn't know quite what to expect. The words being chanted were familiar, but while I expected to be led by a single cantor, the service was led by the entire community. Each of the various "cantors" knew exactly when it was his turn to carry on the melody.

A full choir of voices sang Shir Chadash, the 98th Psalm, each voice totally committed to having his prayers heard. Lecha Dodi was started by one of the elders and then alternated among another seven great voices.

Even two small children assumed their parts after the Shema, and their sweet voices echoed through the small sanctuary: "Asher hozeiti etchem m'eretz Mitzraim" (Who took you out of Egypt).

About 15 minutes before the end of the service, a young leadership group representing American federations arrived en masse. Suddenly, it was standing room only!

Surprisingly, the service ended with the tune of Hatikvah. It took me awhile to realize that they were singing the words to Yigdal.

After an all-day cooking class at the hotel La Maison Arabe, I asked my teacher, Mohammed, to help me locate the blue and white Alzama Synagogue in the mellah, the old Jewish quarter in Marrakech's medina. I had read about it, and all of my attempts to find it had so far failed.

Mohammed asked me if I knew where the spice market was located. As I had been there a number of times and felt I could easily find my way back, I told him I did.

"Go and see my friend Ben Ali at number 55. He'll take you to the synagogue," Mohammed advised.

It was not hard to find Ben Ali.

He left his small store in which he sells herbs and spices, the most famous of which is a mixture of 35 spices known as ras el hanout, and led me by the hand, through a number of small streets and alleyways.

But I saw nothing that was blue and white!

Then, in a very narrow street, he knocked on a door.

A man – the shammas as it turned out – opened up the door, and we stepped into the magnificent blue-and-white-tiled courtyard of the Alzama Synagogue.

Ben Ali and the shammas were very cordial with each other, like two old friends, which I'm sure that they are. For all I know, the synagogue might purchase their spices from Ben Ali, for the soup kitchen and community centre the synagogue operates from the premises.

After my Jewish experiences, especially the one of erev Shabbat at the Bet El Synagogue, I could only imagine the energy that must have permeated the Marrakech Jewish community when it comprised thousands of Jews and the Friday night Kabalat Shabbat service was standing room only.

Wherever my travels take me, when I experience the joy of a Friday night service, I always feel as though I have come home. As I did in Marrakech.

Brothers create a singing prime minister

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The scene is a northern Alberta bar, circa 1980. The crooner baring his soul in a country and western tune is a young Stephen Harper, musing about leadership and personal destiny.

He is suddenly interrupted by a trio of actors representing the Axis of Liberal. They taunt Harper in a song-and-dance number with the strong vocals and harmonies of a Broadway-style production. The lyrics, however, are pure Second City.

Stephen Harper! The Musical is the latest offering of the award-winning comedy writing team of Daniel and Steve Shehori. This fictionalized account of the prime minister's life, premières at Second City in Toronto next week.

The Shehori brothers, Winnipeg natives who grew up in Toronto, work as writers, producers and directors in television and live productions. They have been doing freelance writing and directing together for 10 years. Stephen Harper! The Musical is their fifth play.

The siblings have won three Canadian Comedy Awards and garnered numerous award nominations for their work. "Last year we were nominated for four national comedy awards," Steve Shehori says.

They have also been nominated for three Geminis, two for The Hour with George Stroumboulopoulos and a third for their writing for the 2008 Gemini Awards show.

The Shehoris have been associated with Toronto Second City since 1998, when Daniel, 36, started working there as an usher, Steve recalls. "Dan went from being an usher to assistant theatre manager. Then he became assistant director of the mainstage shows.

"For the past few years, we've been moonlighting as publicists for Second City. We have a tight relationship. We have in the past produced our own shows for them."

He says Second City approached the brothers about doing a political musical. All they had was a title – Stephen Harper! The Musical.

"We were a little skeptical at first. In the wrong hands, it could be low humour. We didn't want it to be obvious and obnoxious," Steve says.

"We gave Second City some ideas. They were great about letting us do our unusual approach. It's a show of confidence, which is very fulfilling creatively."

He says the show's storyline is inspired by Harper's piano performance at the National Arts Centre last fall, where he played the Beatles song With a Little Help From My Friends.

Daniel says that after this stage debut, Harper's approval ratings went up, so in the fictionalized story of the Harper musical, which is a play within a play, advisers convince the prime minister to do something similar.

"With the election looming, they propose an unorthodox way of getting elected mount a musical of his life in the U.S. Why the U.S.? It's because Canadians tend to get behind someone who is first embraced by Americans."

He says he and his brother wrote the book for the show and one of Second City's resident musical directors, Jay McCarrol, composed the music. "We're very happy with the show. It's our best work to date."

The cast of four includes Ashley Botting, a Second City alumna, Trevor Martin, who starred in Evil Dead: The Musical, Paul O'Sullivan, who was in the Mirvish production of The Producers and James Roussel, a recurring player in CBC television's Air Farce.

The Shehori brothers have also kept some of the production in the family – their cousin, Danielle Kagan, is choreographing the show.

"That was serendipitous," says Steve. "We were looking for a choreographer just as she was moving downtown. She just came back from Israel, and she did choreography there. She's a great fit to choreograph the musical numbers."

He says the musical is the biggest theatrical production he and his brother have done. "We're really excited about it.

"It's important for us not to depict the prime minister in a villainous or cartoonish way. This musical depicts him as a real person.

"Were the prime minister to come see the show, we think he'd get a real kick out of it."

Stephen Harper! The Musical premières at Second City on July 13 and runs until July 25, Tuesdays to Sundays. Call 416-343-0011 or visit Stephenharperthemusical.com.

Polish-born director documents Jews of Poland

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For movie director Slawomir Grunberg, a now-defunct Jewish school in Poland was the gateway for an examination of Jewish life there after World War II.

Grunberg's newest film, The Peretzniks, was screened in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa last month.

The documentary focuses on the Peretz school in Lodz – a city in central Poland – and the bittersweet memories that bind its graduates around the world.

Slawomir Grunberg

Established in 1945, the Peretz school closed in the aftermath of the 1968 state-orchestrated anti-Semitic campaign in Poland, an event that prompted thousands of Jews to emigrate.

"When I learned about the phenomenon of the Peretz school, whose graduates still meet regularly like one big family, I knew that this was a story for a documentary," said Grunberg, who did not attend the school.

He added, "In the film, I wanted to address the complexities of Jewish existence in post-war Poland under the Communist regime. The life and death of the school was my vehicle to carry this story."

Grunberg, a graduate of the Polish Film School in Lodz, believes that The Peretzniks reaffirms the fact that Poland had a substantial Jewish community after the war, notwithstanding the Holocaust.

"At its peak just after the war, a quarter of a million Jews lived in Poland. There were Jewish schools, clubs, theatres and summer camps. It was a proud society with a will not only to survive, but to flourish."

Grunberg, born in Lublin but raised in Warsaw, comes from such a family.

Grunberg's father, Karol, originally from Drohobych, is a historian and author. The family of his mother, Danuta, is from Vilnius, in present-day Lithuania. During the Nazi occupation, his father escaped to the Soviet Union, but virtually all the members of his family were murdered. Her mother's family, which converted to Christianity from Judaism at the turn of the 20th century, were not persecuted.

Grunberg was not affected by the 1968 anti-Semitic campaign, but his father was touched by it.

"It definitely affected him emotionally," he said, "but he decided not to leave Poland because his mother was sick and he wanted to take care of her. He had to 'emigrate' from Warsaw to the provincial town of Torun, where he continued teaching modern history at the University of Torun."

In 1980, after graduating from the Polish Film School, Grunberg found himself in New York City, having been invited there by the Museum of Modern Art to screen his new movie, Anna Proletarian. The 20-minute short was a portrait of Anna Walentynowicz, one of the founders of the Solidarity trade union movement.

He arrived in New York six weeks before martial law was imposed in Poland, but his film, deemed "anti-Communist propaganda" by the authorities, was impounded.

Reluctant to return to Poland, Grunberg decided to stay in the United States. "At first, I was a street vendor, selling peanuts," he recalled. But within nine months, he was teaching film at the University of Cincinnati. He went on to teach at universities in Chicago, St. Louis and Ithaca.

Grunberg, who currently lives in Manhattan's West Village, started his film company, Log-In Productions, in 1987, and has since directed and produced more than 50 television documentaries on Jewish and general topics.

Grunberg's Jewish-themed films run the gamut from The Legacy of Jedwabne and The Warsaw Ghetto to Shtetl and Stan Borys: A Diary of an Artist.

He hopes to make a film about Jan Karski, the Polish underground emissary who corroborated rumours of Nazi plans to exterminate the Jews of Poland.

"It's the story of a man who, having infiltrated the Warsaw Ghetto and a Nazi concentration camp, carried eyewitness accounts of the atrocities to the West. Karski's report was mostly met with disbelief, and no action was taken to prevent the Holocaust."

Grunberg's films on non-Jewish topics range from Michael and Svetlana, which is on a Russian matchmaking service, to School Prayer, which is about an American community at odds over Christian prayers in a public school district.

"I'm involved with many film projects that deal with Poland," said Grunberg, who visits his birthplace several times a year. "I feel great in Poland. I have very good memories of Poland. Lately, mainly because of my films and personal connections and friendships, I've become involved in Jewish life in Poland."

Grunberg's films on Polish Jewish subjects have been screened at schools and cultural festivals in Poland. "There are often discussions after the screenings. The audience is interested in the subject matter and asks the right questions," he said.

In his view, some Poles are genuinely interested in Poland's Jewish past and present.

"Jewish life is very vibrant in big cities like Warsaw, Krakow and Wroclaw," he said. "And there are plenty of Jewish festivals and other events."

But, as he suggested, anti-Semitism remains entrenched in Polish society. "It may still take time to overcome the negative feelings and stereotypes, especially in small towns and villages."

Despite this, the Poland he knows today does not resemble the Poland he left almost three decades ago. "It is a very different Poland, modernized and much more open to change," he observed. "It is hardly an issue to be a Jew in Poland today, especially in the metropolitan intelligentsia environment. On the contrary, young people often find it trendy."

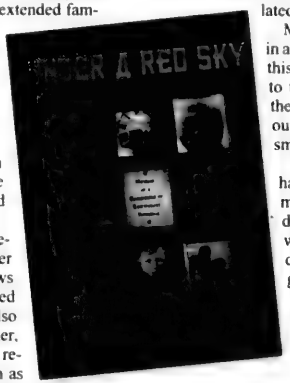
Life in Communist Romania through a child's eyes

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Under a Red Sky, by Haya Leah Molnar (Farrar, Straus & Giroux), is the memoir of a young girl growing up in 1950s Communist Romania.

The author, then Eva Zimmerman, is an only daughter who lives with seven opinionated adults, her extended family, in a small house they share with a Russian couple below them, and another couple with a child Eva's age, Andrei, in the attic above them.



It's a crowded home, full of noise and conflict. Eva shares a bedroom with her parents. One of her uncles sleeps in the kitchen.

Her father works at a government-run film studio and is hardly ever home. Her mother, we are told, was once a top ballerina who turned down the opportunity to dance at the Bolshoi.

Eva is Jewish, something she doesn't become aware of until she is eight, and the reader is only told gradually. At first, the author throws out hints – we are told early on that she is named Eva after the first woman in the Bible, and also to carry on the letter "E," after her grandfather, Emile, who died in Auschwitz. We hear her repeat words her grandparents toss around such as "mitzvah." Her grandmother, upon hearing that her son got engaged to a Romanian woman, says, "It had to be a shikse for my only son."

Her grandfather gives her a mezuzah one day, and she has no idea what to do with it.

But the Jewish aspect is pretty much below the surface in the first half of the book.

The story unfolds at first as a series of short chapters describing various unrelated episodes of her childhood – her first day at school, her home, her village, etc. It is told with the language and diction of a young girl, although I wouldn't say this is a book for young children.

There is no real narrative arc at first, just a series of unrelated descriptive vignettes.

Molnar's description of growing up in a Communist country is at the core of this book. The opening chapter, a visit to the local market with her grandfather, evokes images of old European outdoor markets with all its noise, smells and livestock.

The author vividly describes the hardships of growing up in a Communist country. You realize what a different world she grew up in from what children today are used to. One day a foreign friend of her father's gives her a toiletry kit filled with various items such as soap, hand lotion and a toothbrush– unheard of luxuries in commodity-deprived eastern Europe. Eva is ecstatic. "This is the best present I ever received," she says. She brushes her teeth twice to taste the Belgian toothpaste in her mouth.

She mentions once about never having eaten a banana or an orange.

On her first day at school, at seven years old, the first assignment handed out by the overly patriotic teacher is to write what the Communist party means to her and what it's like to be a true Romanian.

When she is sick, her grandfather has to go to the market to look for lemons (for vitamin C). The doctor tells her parents she requires antibiotics and inquires if they know anybody with connections abroad, since that's the only way to get them.

Molnar describes a world of spies and moles living in the neighbourhood, and how her parents would speak in whispers for fear of being overheard by the dreaded secret police, the Securitate.

And then one day she hears her parents speaking in whispers about applying for passports. She asks her aunt where they're going. "To Israel," her aunt replies. "Where all the Jews belong."

"Jews?" Eva wonders. "We are Jews."

Eva is astounded by this bit of news, that she is what her friend Andrei refers to as a "kike." Would horns grow on her scalp?

She wants to know more about Judaism, and despite her grandmother's protests, that being Jewish is dangerous, her grandfather takes her to weekly meetings with a local rabbi who is in the process of training boys for their bar mitzvah. Although being Jewish isn't strictly illegal, they want to keep her visits quiet. It's not worth it to bring more attention to themselves.

The rabbi keeps a Torah scroll hidden in a secret room behind his library. Eva loves hearing Hebrew spoken and learning the Hebrew alphabet. "Every time he opens his mouth to form a word, I imagine a beautiful Hebrew letter flying off the Torah scroll and up toward the ceiling, until all the letters are gathered in a crown of dancing words above us," she writes.

After they apply for passports and visas, their lives change drastically. Her father loses his job, and Eva is told not to tell other kids in school that she is Jewish. Her mother is followed by the Securitate and harassed after being observed entering the Israeli consulate.

Although the narrative is at times disjointed, probably because of the intentional childlike point of view, Molnar's memoir gives the reader an interesting view of life behind the Iron Curtain. Although it might be listed as a children's book, it's probably more appropriate for late teens and young adults, although us "older" adults will also find Molnar's vivid descriptive story interesting.

A study of Eichmann

A recent arrival is Eichmann's Men by Hans Safrian (Cambridge University Press), a lecturer at the University of Vienna. This book examines and reconstructs the "careers" of Adolf Eichmann and his men, almost all Austrian, who supervised the mass deportations of Jews from the Reich and occupied territories from 1938 to the end of World War II.

Chronologically, it traces the escalation of the Holocaust from the forcible expulsion of Jews from Germany and Austria and the confinement of Polish Jews, to the policies of mass murder in 1941 and 1942 and the deportations to concentration and extermination camps from 1942 to 1944.

The book examines the activities of these SS men, who under Eichmann's supervision drove hundreds of thousands of people from their homes or deported them to concentration and extermination camps. Were Eichmann's men mechanical parts of a machine, or did personal initiative determine their actions?

The author, who has written numerous works on the war and Nazi crimes, also investigates the assumed existence of Hitler's specific order for the destruction of European Jewry in 1941 and the meaning of the term the "Final Solution of the Jewish question."

This book has the potential to become the standard academic work on Eichmann and his involvement in the Holocaust. – JS
